Any official who thinks it good economy to let criminals off easy because of the expense has a very poor conception of his duties and very slovenly ideas about the administration of justice. The most economical plan is to deal so rigorously with the criminal classes as to stop their career at once and terrify others. Laxity in executing the laws is the most expensive policy that could be pursued. A justice of the peace who fails to do his duty on the ground that he is saving the county a bill of costs, or any other person connected with the enforcement of the laws who takes the matter of expense into consideration, is foolishly and blindly doing that which in the end is most extravagant. Officials generally, including jurymen, should remember that they are not economists, charged with the duty of keeping down expenses, but law-abiding and justice-loving citizens whose duty it is to uphold the majesty of the law at all hazards.— -The Greenlee property on W.
