the circumstances." Beth's lips quivered, but she tried to smile.

"Perhaps it does sound silly, now that our honeymoon's over," said bravely, and then hurried from the room.

"I guess," she said. "Yes, it is over," he murmured feebly and turned his face to the wall.

In the middle of the afternoon one of the hired men came to the house and asked to see Mr. Bradley.

"There's a kid here," he said, "that wants to hire out."

"Where does he come from?" Jack asked.

"From some place beyond Lemmon's, I guess. He says he wants to sleep in an eat home, so it can't be off. Shall I tell him he can stay, sir?"

"I am only too glad to get him," Jack replied.

When the men left the field at supper time the new hand was very tired.

When Jack abandoned his paper for a cigar the old lady behind Beth leaned forward. "Excuse me," she said, "but are you going far?"

"I don't know," she said. "I'm married now, you know."

"Then the old man said, "My husband has a farm out west. We are going there now, but we intend to stop at several places on the way."

"And then?" smiling wistfully.

"Why, then you must go into the smoking car, dear."
