Canals as Rate Regulators

In the field of transportation there is a decided revival of interest and activity in interior canal construction. Be fore the advent of the railroad the canal formed the most serviceable means for the transport of freight between important centers of industry. It had the advantage over the freighting wagon of being able to carry material in considerable bulk and at lower cost; more over, under average conditions, it was a more rapid method of transportation. ough the canal interests maintained an active competition with the early time decided the question in favor of the latter and canal traffic declined, many of the lines falling into disrepair and finally into disase and finally into disase.

The decadence of the inland waterway has been more complete in some countries than in others, for in France and Germany there came, in course of time, a revival of activity and a new era of construction which has brought canal traffic up to the position of importance, both as a regulator of rates and an important auxiliary to the railroads, which it should property all. The canal system of Great Britain, on the other hand, has declined until it consists of a few inadequate and littleconsists of a few inadequate and little-related lines, which are too ill-equipped and too insignificant to exert any serious influence upon the freight traf-

At the present time a royal commission is engaged in an inquiry into the same system of the country; but such semmissions move slowly, and the necessity for individual action has led the individual interests of the great the individual interests of middle and such as the individual interests of the great the individual interests of middle and such as the individual interests of middle and such as the individual interests of the great the individual interests of the gr facturing counties of middle and ern England to take action at a rence held at the invitation of the ham Chamber of Commerce. The First One Was Swept Away With The first lighthouse on Minot's ledge was built in 1848. It was an octagonal tower resting on the tops of eight tiron piles eight inches in diameter and sixty feet high, with their bases sunk five feet in the rock. These piles were braced together in many ays, and, as they offered less surface to the waves than a solid structure, this lighthouse was considered by all auorities upon the subject to be excepionally strong. Its great test came in April, 1851. On the 14th of that month, two keepers being in the lighthouse, an easterly gale set in, steadily increasing in force. People on shore, and no doubt the
