Drawing Lessons

For Schools, Lyceums, and Families The following are among the reasons why Drawing is an appropriate branch of common education, and of course, deserving of general attention, both in schools and families. 1. It is extensively, applicable to the common pursuits of life, especially the mechanical arts, and civil engineering; as it is to nearly every de-outing at of science.

2: Experience has fully proved that Drawing according to the science and the science an and Writing are tearned in connexion sooner and better, term Writing is or can be separately; 3. A daily exercise in writing descriptions o carious objects, both of nature and art, in addition and offices, in this vicinity, for that of a drawing them, furnishes practical and highly the Post Office. We sometimes find useful lessons in Spelling, Grammar, and Com-position, which render pupils more thorough in those important branches of education, than they box, intended for the mails. These we, can ever become, by merely committing to memory spelling book columns, and the abstract definitions and inless of grammar.

Standing once at our front window, especially for beginners, they prevent a great desive and so ineffectual in school instructions.

5. The combined exercise of drawing and de cribing-objects, leads cial bent to think-to ob serve, examine and understand various depart-ments of histore and art; and thus constantly stores their minds with useful and entertaining knowledge, and protects them from the numerous misfortunes of ignorance and view. We saw at once that she had, as hundreds before had done, mistaken our office for the Post Office; -and the name given was that upon the letter which we had some months before, sent from our letter box to that of the Post Office.

"He has not written, thev," said Cathafine, in a low voice, evidently not intended for our ear.

"But-he may have written." "Then where's the letter?" said she, ööking up. "At the Post Office, perhaps." And we took Catharine by the hand and led her to the door, and pointed out the way to the Post Office. "You will ask at the window," said we, "but as the clerks are young men, you need not tell them from whom you expect the letter,"

"Not for the world, said she, looking into our face with a glance that seemed to say there was no harm in telling us." We must have used less than our usual: precision in directing Catharine to the Post Office, as quite half an hour afterwards, when visiting the place, we saw her at the window, receiving her change of Catharine in the marriage list, to which ve had determined to keep a steady look. It was but a short time afterwards that we did indeed see the name of Thomas in the papers. He was one of the passengers in the ship cast away below N. York, of whom nearly every soul perished, and Thomas among the rest.

We had never seen Thomas, but had omehow cherished such an interest in his fate, that we felt a severe shock at its annunciation-and what must have been the feelings of Catharine, with her ardent, sangeine, leish, temperament! Loving three or four letters in our own letter deeply as she must have loved, and hoping ardently as she must have loped, what must have been her feelings? We paused a few weeks afterwards, we observed a young woman, whose face to mark the young grass shooting, green and thick, in Ronaldson's grave yard, and to see the buds swelling on the branches of the trees that decorate that populous city of the dead, when a funeral numerously attended, wound slowly around the corner of the street, and passed into the enclosure. It was the funeral of an Irish person-we knew by the numbers that attended -- and as the sexton lowered the coffin down into the narrow house, the place appointed for all living, we saw
