trained step and spirit free!

From various gardens cull'd with care.

Mountain Children.

Go gladly forth and drink of joy your fill,

No city wall proscribes your further bound;

And the old trees that cast a colemn shade,

The pleasant evening, the fresh, dewy ho

Round which the silent clouds hang day and nigh

And the low voice of water, as it makes,

Like a glad oreature, murmurings of delight.

Give your hearts up unto their mighty power; For in his spirit God has clothed the earth, And speaketh solemnly from tree and flower.

Twining its flowers, and shouting, full of glee;

Of storm and mountain have the noblest sons,

Were of the hills like you, ye little ones!

Are taught within the mountain solitudes,

For heary legends to your wilds belong,

And yours are haunts where inspiration broods

Then go forth—earth and sky
To you are tributary; joys are spread
Profusely, like the summer flowers that lie

In the green path, beneath your gamesome trea

That night the two lovers sat together in he palace of the prince, with hands linked in each others, gazing out on the moonlit river, that lay like a sheet of silver beneath the balcony. With her bridal gems around her, and the light of happiness in her eyes, Haidai sat listening to her lover's narration, as he told how her beauty had won his heart long ago, her check would flush, and with a smile of gladness wreathing her lovely mouth, she would turn for a moment from her lover's face, and look out across the sleeping waters. But it would
