Henry Clay, the American statesman;—[loud and repeated cheering] he who had during his whole public life stood up as the friend and advocate of American labor and of American interests; enthusiastic cheers the father of the American system, with the eagle eye of a watchful guardian of the public weal, saw the danger that threatened the existence of his favorite system, and determined to stretch forth his arm to save it. With that keen sagacity which characterises him, and with that tact and talent which so eminently distinguished him, he looked around him for the means of averting the threatened fate of the Protective Policy. He saw the President arrayed against multification, and South Carolina in arms against the Federal Government. There was an irreconcileable hostility between the nullifiers and force the latent the contract of the concileable hostility between the nullifiers and average of fifteen per cent, and would save the manufacturer and operative from immediate, utter, and hopeless ruin.

Mr. Clay communicated his views to Mr. Clayton and other friends of the Protective Policy; h the rish to eatch a glimpse of his features was so that the processions were brought to a stand, and it was found impossible to move.

Among the different processions, were many string; interesting and laughable spectacles. We noticed nearly all sorts of handieralts: a spinning trom his enemies.
