This is a great christity. From Ircland we re-turned to London, by way of Bristol, and are now nearly roady to set out for, Germany, and Italy, perhaps to Egypt; and who knows but I may write my brother Slicer a letter from the valley of Jehoshapat, in Judea. Let him look out for s it. To the meantime I send you an extract from it. In the meantime I send you an extract from my journal, entitled

A VISIT TO FATHER MATHEW. A VISIA TO FAIRER MAIREW. But smong all the attractions at Cork, the Rev. Theobald Mathew, the apostle of temperance in Ireland, was to me the most attractive; and I had the good fortune to find him at his own house, just returned from Limerick. In reply to my let-the which have all the interview of the rest, but smoothed was to me the most attractive; and I had the good fortune to find him at his own house, just returned from Limerick. In reply to my let-the which have all the interview of the rest of ter which I sent him, he dispatched a messenger to our hotel, saying he would be pleased to see me at any hour. I waited on him at half past his plain but commodious house, I found the room his plain but commodious house, i tound the foom on the ground floor full of very plain people, all standing around a secretary, who was making a most vehemient speech to them on the benefits of temperance. He was showing how it increased the vigor and power of enduring fatigue, and il-lustrated it by a boat race which hud just taken place between three crews; one, whiskey drink-ers, one, ale or beer drinkers, and one cold water drinkers. As he advanced in his animated declamation, he raised his huge fist aloft, saying the tee totalers came out first, the ale drinkers next, and the nasty, dirty rum and whiskey drink-ers last, which declaration he confirmed by bring ing down his lion's paw with tromendous weight upon the luge record book containing the four ons of names of those who have taken the pledge from Father Mathew. It really was a novel and interesting scene. I soon learned that the secretary was entertain-ing the crowd until Father Mathew could come down from his tea and administer the pledge to them. In a few minutes he came down, and having spoken to us with much kindness and affec-tion, he turned to the motley group, and asked if they wished to take the pleage. They came for-ward an masse, and kneeled down before him. He said, "It is all for your good; may now are decent, well clad, and comfortable, who, before they took the pledge, were naked, hungry and wretched: say, after me, I promise, by divine as-sistence, to abstain from all intericating liquors, ed, "May God give you grace to keep your rose from their knees, and he directed their names to be inscribed in the great book.

We witnessed the same scene next morning at and the pledge from Father Mathew than from any other. Hence but fow take it of others, and always take it ogain of Father Mathew, when o comes from within ten to thirty miles of them. There were persons present when we were in the room who had come thirty miles to take the pledge. He informed us that he had seen etual, and the party may not dissolve the ration at pleasure. He may disregard and obligation at pleasure. violate it, as some do, but he cannot, as we ex-
