THE WEDDED STATE.

From the Pennsylvania Inquirer.
Dear woman—here can be seen
Of all the things, woman fair—
Dear woman—here can be seen
Of all the things, woman fair—
Dear woman—here can be seen
Of all the things, woman fair—

AN ADVENTURE.

The Philadelphia Saturday Collier relates the following amusing incident:—
A few years since, a young merchant of Philadelphia, who had just escaped from the snares of single blessedness, started on a collecting tour to the West. His new bride, with a congenial to women, made him a woollen garment, which she requested him to wear next his person, as a protection against the sudden changes of temperature, that he might encounter on his journey. Grating as it was to his feelings, he obeyed the kind injunction, and for the first time since the days of his infancy, he became enveloped in a flannel shirt. The hour of separation arrived, and the young bride had some experience in the pushing and shoving of parting scenes. She was ready to imagine that that of our young married friends must have been one of deep emotion and solicitude.

REACHING THE POINT WHERE THE RAILROAD.

Reaching the point where the Railroad terminates about half way to Pittsburgh, our traveller, with several others, was put into a stage coach, which dashed northward toward the mountains. This sort of movement produced an exhilarating effect on most of the company. But one was so much excited as our friend. The flannel shirt, which was at first irritating, had become insufferable. Even the law of love made yield to overruling necessity. At nightfall the coach stopped, as if to exchange horses. Our friend, after giving particular instructions to his companions not to depart without him, sprang out, called for a room, and was soon stripped to the waist. At this moment he heard the rattling of wheels, and, fearful of being left behind, gathered up his clothes, rushed out and halted; but his coat was not needed. Grotesque as was his appearance, time was too precious to be wasted in the formalities of the toilet, and he made rapid strides after the receding stage. He passed a wood-chopper, who mistaking him for a thief, started two dogs in pursuit. This new motive power accelerated his speed, and he was evidently nearing the stage. His shouts were heard. He beckoned to his comrades, and reproached them for their treachery. He was now within reach of the stage, and grasping it violently secured his position. He was rudely scolded, and a heavy man, a crazy man, it was thought by the company. The driver took the alarm, and applied the whip loudly to the bare shoulders of our friend. He was obliged to get his hold. Again he attempted to regain his seat; but was received with blows and kicks on the breast. The horses were jolted to the top of their speed, and dashed up to a tavern door. The half naked man was ushered in, severely bruised, faint and exhausted. The stage travellers gathered round him, but in his utter consternation, he did not recognize the countenance of a single individual. He thought his reason had deserted him, and when all present protested that he was an entire stranger to them, he became more and more bewildered, and finally began to doubt his own identity.

WINTER IN THE COUNTRY.

When I awoke the next morning, the sun was high in the heaven, the storm was past; and a scene of dazzling magnificence and beauty was spread before my chamber window. The parsonage commands a country landscape of fifteen or twenty miles in every direction, mountain and valley, woods and running streams. For some weeks the whole had been clothed with snow a few inches in depth; the rain of yesterday, freezing on the surface had covered it with a glaze of ice, and now in the clear cold air of a winter morning, the bright sun poured a flood of glory over the vast field before me. Every twig of every tree was a pendant jewel sparkling in the sunlight; the stubble which the snow had not covered glistened like diamonds strewn upon a limitless mirror of gold; even the fences, clothed in ice, shone like lines of light through the wide expanse; and all nature seemed to leap and dance for joy as the morning of a new existence. "Great glory this," said I to Eschbach, as he started me from my reverie in the grandeur of his own winter scenery. "Yes," said he, "it is winter in the country."
