

E. SEATTY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. CARLISLE, PA.

The journals in Pittsburg complain of the conduct of some of the storekeepers in that city, taking advantage of the recent scarcity to put up the provisions. Some of the landlords also raised the rent of their houses. In contradiction to this heartless conduct is that of the neighboring cities and towns, where the inhabitants have freely contributed provisions and money to relieve the sufferers.

TEMPERANCE IN MICHIGAN.—The Legislature passed an act at its late session, by which the voters of each town, at their annual meeting, are to vote "yes" or "nay" on the question of granting license to sell ardent spirits within such town during the succeeding year. By a supplementary act this law is made to take immediate effect.

RIOT AT THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.—We learn from the Richmond Star, that a disgraceful riot had occurred at the University of Virginia growing out of some ill feeling between the students and Prof. W. E. Rogers. It appears there is a Calumny band of students attached to the institution, who made it a point to disturb the Faculty almost nightly, and that Prof. Rogers and another of the Faculty openly denounced the proceeding, which caused their houses to be mobbed. The college windows and doors were also broken open and on Friday night last an attempt was made to blow up the old trees around the building. This made it necessary for the Faculty to call on the police, and finally the military, and the University is now, says the Star, in possession of 500 soldiers. The students have held a meeting and pledged themselves to restore order if the military were withdrawn.

say they require something more than pledges. Hon. W. C. River declared the Faculty and Students on Monday upon the subject. Most of the students have left the Faculty; it is understood, will resign, and for the present the college appears to be broken up.

FROM BRAZIL.—According to information from Brazil, we are likely to get into serious difficulty with that country, on account of a U. S. ship having a slave vessel filled with slaves, &c., but which the Government of Brazil compelled it to surrender. It is said Mr. Wise is awaiting instructions what to do, and that he urges the immediate despatch of a large naval force in that quarter, and the return of himself to the United States. The Brazilians are represented as daily insulting our flag, and the Government is fitting out its whole naval force the full belief that a conflict is at hand. It is also said that Cabinet Councils have already been held upon the subject at Washington, and even an extra session of Congress talked of.

Mr. Buchanan's reply to Senator Almon's protest has appeared in the journals. It civilly informs the ex-minister and his government that, as the annexation of Texas is an fait accompli, or what Mr. Cushing would call a fait accompli, there is no use in arguing about its propriety; but the President hopes that Mexico will be endeavoring to do all in her power to make an amicable adjustment of all differences.

CONGRESS.—A disease, called the bone fever, prevails, says the Ledger, almost universally in Philadelphia, among the females. The symptoms which attend the complaint are an extraordinary demand upon the pockets of parents or husbands, an eager desire to examine all the bonnets and ribbons and flowers in every store in the city, and the violence of these symptoms is not abated until the new article has been worn to church the first Sunday after it is sent home from the milliner's.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL is preparing to carry the new office law into execution. It is advertised for $15,000 that the various post offices in the U. S. States, constructed on a plan best calculated to ascertain the weight of letters, and other mail matter, from a half ounce to eight ounces, under the post office law of 20th March, 1845.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

THE OREGON QUESTION.

The California, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston at 11 o'clock on Monday night. There has been an important debate in the British Parliament on the Oregon, disclosing the views of England on that subject. It was deemed so important that the opinion of the British Ministry should be known in America, that the California was detained one day in order to bring out the debate on that question which took place in Parliament on the 4th inst., and which we give below.

The operations of the new Tariff, especially as respects foreign free grown labor sugar, is becoming more general than was in the first instance contemplated. The general produce markets are very firm and a considerable amount of business is doing privately in wool, indigo and cotton wools.

The French Government intend to organize a line of Franco-American mail steamers immediately. The Minister of Marine has reported a law precisely like that of 1841, by which four steamers are to run between Cherbourg and New York.

It was reported in Dublin last week that Mr. O'Connell, unable longer to withstand the pressure from the leaders of the Young Ireland party, will attempt, in the course of the ensuing summer, to organize monster meetings on the same scale as those which created so much apprehension in the year 1843.

It appears that O'Connell has become perfectly rabid on the subject of the Annexation of Texas. It is reported that he could not find words in the English language to express his contempt for slaveholders and for Americans generally.

THE OREGON QUESTION. This question has excited intense interest. The excitement has not been confined to the House of Commons, but has prevailed, more or less, all the great commercial citizens. The burst of cheering which followed the close of Sir Robert Peel's speech, when he declared that if our rights were invaded, we are resolved and prepared to maintain them, came from all parts of the house, without reference to the party to which they belonged.

There is every reason to believe, the nation almost to a man. Lord John Russell called the attention of the House to that part of the Inaugural Address of President Polk, which referred to the subject of the Oregon territory. The Inaugural Address had taken this question out of the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement, and required some notice on the part of the members of the House. The noble lord then commented strongly upon the language of the President. "Our title," said he, "to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children." He called this a "blustering announcement," and having given a history of the negotiations connected with the subject, left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Sir Robert Peel, the English Premier, followed in a speech of considerable length, which concluded with the following emphatic language: "On the 4th of March, 1845, the present President of the United States made that address to which the noble lord has referred. It is right to state, that since that inaugural address, we have had no communication from our Minister in the United States. He wrote a letter transmitting the address but had no time to make any comment upon it. No diplomatic negotiations have taken place between him and the present Government of the United States, as we are aware."

When I say that no such negotiations have taken place, I do not mean up to the present time, but at the date of the last accounts. We have had no direct communication, but I think it highly probable that Mr. Fakenhild would have continued with the present Government the negotiations that were in progress, but since the resignation of Mr. Calhoun and the appointment of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of State, we have had no communication. All we know is what is contained in the President's Address. I think it highly probable that the negotiations have been renewed, or rather continued by Mr. Fakenhild. At no distant period, the result of that renewed negotiation must be known. I think it my duty not to despair of a favorable result of the negotiation; but in case there should be an unfavorable result, if the measure which we have already proposed should be rejected, and if no counter proposals should be made by the United States which are likely to lead to an amicable adjustment of these differences, if that should be the issue, it will then be the duty of the Government to lay upon the table of the House all the communications that have taken place, trust, however small, that will not be the case. I still hope that an amicable adjustment of the claims of the two countries may be made, notwithstanding the last address of the President.

I must, however, express my deep regret that while the negotiations were pending the chief executive authority of the United States should, in a public address, refer to all these things, which have referred to other countries than a friendly and satisfactory termination of these differences. Such a reference is not likely to lead to that issue which may tend to the maintenance of the amicable relations between the two countries, which we all desire.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1845.