DEATH.

BY HENRY VAUGHAN, -(1520.) Though since thy first sad entrance by Just Abel's blood, Tis now six thousand years well mgh, And still thy sovreignty holds good, Vet by none art thou understood.

We talk and name thee with much case, As a tried thing. And every one can slight his lease, As if it ended in a spring. Which shades and bowers doth rent tree br

No they dark land they heedless go: But there was One Who search'd it quite through, to and fro, And then returning like the Sun, Discover'd all that there is done:

And since his death, we thoroughly see All thy dark way; Thy shades but thin and narrow be, Which His first looks will quickly fray; Must but makes triumph for the day.

As harmless violets which gave Their virtues here___ For salves and syrups, while they live, a often calmly disappear, And neither givere, repine or fear,

To die His servants-and as sure Shall they revide: Then let not dust your eyes obscure, But lift them up where said alive, Though Red from you their spirits live.

SWEET IS THE BREATH OF

This is the sweetest season of the whole year. There is a joyful elasticity about it and place. which cheers and invigorates the mind. -If the body, when it first makes its visit, is too sensitive to its lively touches, and droops a moment under its influence, it is but to prepare itself to meet the glowing summer which treads upon its fairy footsteps with renewed power and livelier sensations. There are but few who do sensations. There are but few who do not feel amidst all the luxurient trasses with which Spring wreaths her bright fair brows, an unusual pressure svising from the sudden unbracing of the constitution, which undergoes nearly as great a change as the vegetable kingdom itself. But the system soon regains its natural tone and Taises up out of its feebleness to drink in the nectar of the gentle zephyrs, loaded with ambrosial sweets.

The return of Spring awakens universal nature from her dreary sleep, and animates and gives a voice to all her works. It is a fresh cause of gratitude, and should elevate the soul and draw out the affections to that great and good being who conducts the seasons in their rounds. Yes, to Him we should be lifted up, whose bountiful hands have covered the earth with its speen carpet, and fringed it with a rich drapery, and enriched it with necessary food for man and beast. The earth is one of this palaces, spread out and fashioned by the great Architect himself to display his power and show his mercy. He has loaded every department of it with his richest the broad banner of his love and benificance.

But soon the beautiful emanelling will pass away and Spring begin to droop, her tresses wither, and her eyes grow dim.—

Dreary Winter will then rush upon her like an armed warrior clothed in icicles, attended by his desolating train, and with rude and rough hands despoil her of her jewelled robes, and onite deface even the from the load of the load o
