Fresh Pine Oil.
THE subscriber has just received a large quantity of Fresh Pine Oil, which he has just delivered, with directions that it should be given into the bridegroom's own hands. The curiosity of all was excited, and Otto was induced by his solicitations to open the packet immediately; and as he was drinking to his bride, he at length produced a plain wooden drinking cup, with a silver rim, on which was engraved, "Present de nocce du Groom."

When Otto opened the cup, he was smiling, and lifting up the cup, to his bride, she said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

She then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

She then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

She then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

She then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

She then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

Select Tale.

THE BEGGAR'S MARRIAGE GIFT.

Otto von Z— after an absence of several years, two of which he had spent in the luxurious capital of France, was recalled to his native Germany by the unexpected death of his father. He found the family estate involved in difficulties, chiefly occasioned by extravagance and mismanagement, which would have appeared inexorable to a mind possessing less energy than his own; but by at once adopting a system of economy and method, he soon succeeded in bringing matters in such a train, as not only enabled him to discharge the accumulated arrears of interest, but also gradually to reduce the principal debt, with which his property had been incidentally burdened.

It was not until his mind was relieved of this first care, and he could unintermittedly form his plans for the future, that Otto thought of choosing a companion who might share with him the sweets of life, and assist him in the discharge of his duties. He had long loved the youngest daughter of his neighbor, Von Z—, an interesting girl of fourteen; on his return, he found her blooming in all the charms of youthful innocence; and he was not slow in observing, as well in the hearty welcome she gave him, as in the tale which she told him of her life, that his addresses would not be unacceptable. He therefore embraced an early opportunity to declare his sentiments; and, after the preliminaries usual on such occasions, the happy day was fixed, and he was observed with all due solemnity, by the country people in some parts of Germany, all religiously kept up, according to the good old customs of their forefathers.

First came the wedding guests, conducted by the bride and groom, with a tall bell-ringing, the last of which was met on the lawn by the peasantry, preceded by the village musicians. The married couple brought their offering of a cradle; and fine baby-linen, spun by themselves; the bride presented her husband with a pair of silver shoes, and the bridegroom with a pair of silver shoes, and the children-dresses and flowers. Adelaide gave her hand to all in silence; Otto spoke few but impressive words, and on concluding invited the whole party, in the name of the bride's father, to a collation and dance on the green, for which preparations had already been made.

The lamps were now lighted up, and the fiddle and pipe were sounding merrily under the sweet-scented linden trees, when a foreign liveried servant, whose coat was rather the worse for wear, made his appearance on the dancing place. His singular looks and strange gesticulations soon collected around him a troop of laughing villagers; but it was not without considerable difficulty gathered from the throng, that he had come from (whose hands and feet were equally eloquent with his tongue) that his master's carriage had been overturned in the neighborhood, and that a wheel was broken to pieces, which he was anxious to have put together as soon as possible.

Who talks of mending wheels, or going further to-day? hiccupped the bride's father, whose satisfaction at his daughter's good looks had disappeared in a moment, and who, in his eagerness to get to the table in time, had uttered a couple of libels. "To-day I shall be putting his ample sides, till all wheels go to shivers; no man shall pass this house to-day; you may tell your master so; but stay you may as well take me to him." So saying, he turned and disappeared, and he proceeded to the highway, where the poor, perceived a small wax-cloth covered carriage lying upset in the road, one of its hinder wheels being as effectually detached as if it had been used in the operation. A tall, thin, and plain looking man, with a long white beard, and a blue frock coat, having his right arm in a sling, a patch over his left eye, and whose woe-begone looks imparted to his general appearance no distant resemblance to the kind of the poor contentment, stood near the vehicle, holding a pale rod, which he supposed that was his walking stick.

No sooner did he perceive the party approaching, than, hastening towards them, he addressed their leader in French, with much politeness of manner and fluency of language. "Infortunio, however, old Z—, the state of his ideas was too muddled to enable him to brush it up at the moment, so that he was obliged to make the stranger understand more by signs than words, that he must not think of continuing his journey that day at all, but must remain with them as a wedding guest.

The invitation was accepted with many thanks, and the stranger, having caused his Sauter to wipe the dust from his hat and opened his suitcase, under which a sort of uniformly modestly presented, and compared it to himself in motion; by the help of a stout crutch-stick; and it further appeared, that his left foot was also disabled, though there was something not ungracious in the hobble. On reaching the linden-tree place, he requested the bridegroom, in the name of the young couple, and after wishing the bridegroom joy, he kissed the bride's hand, with the air of an old beau, and whispered many flattering things to her in his own language.

When this matter was settled, his long white beard, and his pale rod, which he held in his right hand, and which he used to tap with, he said to the bride, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

He then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

He then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

He then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

He then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

He then said, "I have never seen a more beautiful sight in my life, than this!"

and the newest fashion; the words "a la belle, espouse de mon ami," were embroidered on the veil.

The surprise and curiosity on all sides may be easily conceived. All the guests rose from their seats, except the stranger, who remained sitting with the most perfect indifference, and an expression of contempt for what was going forward. Otto, whose growing dislike to the stranger was lessened by his conduct, measured him with an eye of indignation, and allowed himself the more readily to be persuaded by his bride and the other guests to satisfy their curiosity.

"Yes!" he began, a fine glow suffusing his manly cheeks; "yes! I am not ashamed to own it; a beggar—Jacques is the worthy name—is my dearest friend; I wish to explain all to you: in a few words, the present, to accuse myself of a youthful indiscretion, yet I shall not hesitate to do so, as I cannot otherwise, perhaps, do justice to the noble-minded Jacques, whose marriage with my daughter, and the loss of his heart, and the most valued ornament of my Adelaide.

"Then let me wear it to-day," said the lovely girl, with tremulous voice; and the woe-begone, who, quickly transferred from the bride's hand to his own, he fastened with a sigh on his arm. Otto resumed after a short pause:

"During my residence in Paris, I was almost daily in the habit of passing along the Pont-Neuf. At one end of the bridge, and generally about the same spot, there sat a beggar, who, although he seemed scarcely more than fifty, had frequented the place upwards of thirty years, and was commonly known by the name of 'old Jacques.' Not out of any feeling of compassion, but merely because his general appearance interested me, I threw a sou into his hat as often as I changed his seat. This became, at length, so habitual to me, that whenever I approached his station, I put my hand involuntarily into my pocket. He always thanked me every time, and I was not without some degree of pleasure, when I was at leisure about the news of the day—even wanted me now and then to sit on the foot of his chair, and to talk with me.

"My time in Paris was spent very agreeably, and I may flatter myself not altogether without advantage. I lived as decently as my means permitted, and was never extravagant; and my only pleasures were, to read, and to converse with some young men who were addicted to gambling, and who, by little and little, led me on to stake, first small, and then large sums at play. The consequence of this was, that I was obliged to leave Paris, and to go to my father's house, where I had some friends, who became deeply indebted to my father's assistance, that I began to feel the want of my father's assistance.

hearty, a heavy wooden vessel which he placed with difficulty on the table. On removing the lid, you may figure my astonishment when I saw that it was filled to the brim with gold pieces.

"Help yourself, sir," said he, smiling; here are about twelve hundred louis. It is all I have by me in ready cash; but I soon can procure more."

"Do not mistake me," continued my honest Jacques. "I am no common beggar, who drives the trade for love of idleness, and cheat the needy of the charitable gift of the compassionate. I am of noble, though poor birth. Having lost my parents early, I entered the army at my sixteenth year, served under the best of officers, and I was promoted a lieutenant, let this testify, a cross of St. Louis lay on the heap of gold. In my twentieth year, a common-shot carried away my right arm. I received my discharge and was thrown upon the world destitute and hopeless. Ignorant of any trade by which I could gain a livelihood, and rendered incapable of labor by the loss of my arm, I abandoned myself to profound melancholy, which threw me into a long and severe illness. When I recovered, my only resource was to turn to the sale of spirit in the world, and I was not without success. My youth and infirmities gained me more compassion than I had expected; and I soon earned not only my daily subsistence, but became enabled to lay by a trifle daily, and to look upon his service.
