He is ready to use his influence to forestaft the result; a risk involved, he also makes used for bornerty.

Mr. Smith, however, was an agreeable, good humored man. He spoke both well and fluently, and Mrs. Archibald both listened and talked; and the end of it was, they were mutually pleased, and that when Mr. Smith was obliged to get up and take his leave, she invited him with the simple hospitality of a minister's wife, to return to tea, to meet her husband. Mr. Smith was much obliged, would be very happy; but-the fact was, his wife was in town with him. So much the better! Mrs. Archibald would be delighted to be introduced to Mrs. Smith; he must do her the favor to waive the ceremony, and bring her in the evening exactly at seven .-

miles.'

And so it was settled. When the evening came, the weather had changed. It was bitterly cold; the wind blew as the wind only blows in Edinburgh; and it rained—to speak technically, it rained dogs and cats! Mr. and Mrs. Smith differed in opinion as to the necessity of keeping the in opinion as to the necessity of keeping the engagement on such an evening. Mrs. Smith was decidedly averse to the idea of encoun-tering the elements on a dark, cold, wet tem-pestuous night, and all for the purpose of drinking an unpremeditated cup of tea. Mr. Smith, on the other hand, contended that an engagement was an engagement; that the Archibalds were an excellent family to be enquained with and that he knowing their

Mr. Smith had the best of the argument, and he Smith had the best of the argument, and he prevailed. 'A cab was ordered: and shiver-ing and shrinking, they picked their steps across the troltor, and commenced their journey. This time, however, Mr. Smith's southern tongue was understood; and he was driven, not to Dublin street, where he had desired to go, although, of course he took good care to give the coachman the correct number this time, as it was not his intention to drink tea with the green grocer. When they arrived at the house, the cocheman dis-mounted and rung the bell; and Mr. Smith, seeing the door open, let down the window of the coach, although half choked with the wind, and tain that entered, and prepared to make a rush with his wife across the tempest-swept trottoir. swept trattoir.
