Customs at Elba.

On Thursday before Easter and Good Friday, a custom known as La Riunlone del Battenti, is observed-by old men as a pennance, by young ones as an act of prow-ess. The performers having made an iness. The performers having mate an in-cision in their backs with a razor, don a white shirt and a jacket of the same color belonging to their wives or sweethearts, wearing them so hato be open behind. They then go about the country in procession, to make the round of seven churches, beating their wounds with scourges, which beating their wounds with scourges, which, from time to time, they dip in water to rendor them heavier. On their return, the womanking take possession of these gir-ments, covered with blood, and display them, with pride at the public washing-where an under of the superior reductions places, as marks of the superior robustness of their-future or actual lords. Govern-ments have in vain endeavored to abolish this barbarous ceremony-after every successive occurrence of which some of the performers are punished with imprisonment. It is generally wound up with drinking and fighting, which, of course, furnish still more causes for the anger of the authorities.--Brides, on the occasion of their marriage, repair to the ceremony bare-headed; and in the district round about, the mother of a newly married man, on his arrival at his house for the first time with his wife, throws some rice or grain behind the back of her daughter-in-law, to warn her that af-ter that day of joy and festivity she must devote herself to the more serious cares of a good housewife. If old persons marry, or a widower and a widow, they are probably aroused on the day of their nuptials by a noisy scampanata or, ringing of bells and knocking of saucepans, very much resem-bling the old English custom of marrowbones and cleavers. In almost all parts of the island, during the solemnization of the ceremony of marriage, the husband places one of his knees on the dress of his bride, which prevents the secret powers from any malignant trick; for these latter, it appears in the absence of this rite, on the pronuciation of the sacred words, "Vos conjugo," are apt to whisper others which have a bad effect on the future population of the island.
