We occasionally meet with newsmip, r articles, written for the day, in the, carry of editorial life, which would do mor to the finest writers of English anguage. We have rarely seen fancy, spectry and philosophy more beautifully ombined than in the following thoughts m spring, which we copy from the Led-

Spring Time of the Year is Coming.

The snow-drop rises up timidly from the earth, and opens upon a world strewn raickly with the relies of last years flowers. And yet it is so fresh, so green, so healthful, that it seems as if it were never to decay and die. Its beauty is Est a thing of chance, but of design .he whole mass of the earth from pole to pole, and from centre to circumferrice, must have been taken into the amount and weighed in order that just the proper degree of strength, might be given to its stem. At a certain stage, the stalk bends, and its head lows, and again after a while the bealth of the plant requires that it should lift itself up one more. Were the bulk of the earth greater or less, the fibre would be too weak or too strong, and this flower could not be perpetuated. And so too up to the moment of its perfection, all the elenents of nature contribute to its progress. and seem as if made but for this and for this alone. The frosts of winter are nature's great ploughshare to, stir the ground, and the snow affords it a warm overing for the delicate root, the rains soften the earth around it, and the dews rairesh its feaves. The beams of the wurm sun develope it, and the gentle winds waft open the flower. All nature thus contributes to its perfection, and earth, like a happy mother, exults in the modest bending beauty of her offspring. And yet wait but a few days, and the very elements that combined for its perfection, now conspire for its destruction. The rains beat it down, the sun scorches and withers it, the winds tear and twist it, and at last the frost utterly destroys And now all seems dead and gone, and the cool safering superficial reasoner asks why all this purposeless profusion. this beauty wasted, this prodigality of labor without end or aim? Because this apparent decay has ripened the seeds of more life than has withered.

And man too "cometh forth as a flower." and enters life a modest strangor in the midst of a word strewn thickly with the relics of the dying and the dead. And yet each generation comes with a freshness and a faith, a gaiety, innocence, hope and courage of its own, that seems as if it could brave the law of misery and of mortality. We may be told that, like the flower, all this must soon wither. What then? It is a shallow philosophy that cannot admire the purity of the snow-drop to-day, because it will have faded to-morrow; that refuses to adore the great Author for the beauty and fragrance we now enjoy, because we cannot possess them forever.

Every element of nature, every law alike of matter and of mind, must have been taken into account and weighed in the arrangements of man's powers and his capacity for happiness, and this on a more extensive scale than in the life of any flower. Mark how you infant nature expands and unfolds; first the blade and then the bud, and then the flower. The physical form, the intellectual powers, and last and chiefest, the moral character, rearing themselves in mild supremacy, and in the fulness of their glory, turning towards the great centre, as the sunflower to the sun. The marks of design are more perfect in the works and ways of Providence to man, than in the whole creation beside. All physical and spiritual laws have been taken into the account and adjusted to man, and man to them so wonderously that it would seem at times as if they were arranged for nothing else than his temporial happiness. All have far more of joy than sorrow in the mingled cup of life nor is there a single law of nature, whatever pain it may occasion when violated, but produces a fair preponderating amount of happiness on the whole.

And yet the human flower too soon decays. And the very laws and elements which contributes to man's development, soon combine to lay him low. The exercises that strengthened his 74 youth overtask his age. Care ploughs its furrows in the face, and passion, sorrow, and error bend down alike the head and the heart to the earth. Yet even this has all been taken into the account. All is part of that necessary process, by which the seeds of character are ripened. And if there are thus laws that gravitate downwards, there are higher forces gravitating upwards, and drawing the good to the true centre of happiness. Besides this, all the joys and sorrows of each nation and individual are reprodueing germs of experience and developement for the service of every future age. Thus is wrought out that highest proof of design, and of a governing power in human affairs—the law of progress.
