on that subject; but to no purpose, for he would not give heed to her words.-"Why, mother ?" George asked, after she had spoken to him as above.

"Because," was his mother's answer, "it is not polite-it is improper. How would it look if you should come into the handletreet. parlor some day, when I have company, and begin to whistle :--- it would not be acting politely, would it ?"

"No," George answered slowly. "But then," he resumed after a pause, "I nev-- er whistle before any one but you and father."

"That is all very true, my son," replied ' his mother, "hut you ought to show more respect for us You should never whis? tle in the house, or indeed in any place or on any occasion where it may prove an annoyance to others. The habit of whistling is a very bad one when so constantly kept up and tires almost every one who is within hearing."

After that George took good care that his favorite habit should not annoy others.
