Economic Cultivation.

We have repeatedly seated ourself with the intent of writing upon the best mode of cultivating various crops, and almost as often have we had our actual attention turned to and written upon some other topic. The reason is this: No one, except the favored few who have all the means at command needful in carrying out their plans of farm operations, can do half as well as they know how to do .-Labor is dear, at least when measured by their means, and they cannot afford to hire it Toff a mon that a purse of gold is only an meh-beyond his utmost reach, and you do him no good but to excite feelings-which are within his reach, because they pay so little compared with what he is really anxious but unable to do. Poverty is a terrible burdon, and no where is it felt more to an among invelligent formers.

Notwichstanding these difficulties, we would now argo this chis, of factoris, Livit. * to extend their labor and for diners up u a much smaller quantity of band than is usually dane. Tasted of pla mag live agree of each, plane two or one com;--and plow and cultivate this small held to the entire neglect, if need be, of other acres. If flose lig follow, it will be unceful to the soil, and at least no money will be wasted on them.

We say to such farmers, in the second place, you can do more than than you have done in the preparation of various composts. There are very few farmers who cannot double and treble the quantity and value of those, necessary means of restoring vigor to worn-out and barren soils. By dimit ishing the extent of surface under cultivation, and by proper industry in preparing composts, there is scarcely a farm in the country that cannot be made produce its sixty, and seventy, and eighty bushels of corn to the acre. And even though one acre only is brought up to this desirable condition, a series of years will suffice to bring the whole farm to a high state of cultivation. If only small fields are made thus productive, the hopes and courage of the farmer will be thereby excited, and he will stand manfully among men, and tell of his success as well as they.

We would not advise farmers of limited means to buy guano nor phosphates at anything tike their present prices .-Pay your poorer neighbor his six or eight shillings a day (if you cannot exchange work with him)to help you to collect leaves from the forest, mud from the meadow, carting the latter only after it is tolerably dry, peat or marl from the bog; nd if you can buy barn-yard manures, mix them with turfs, sods, roots, weeds, dirty straw spoilt hay, chips that are unfit to burn; and if we are conveniently situated for it, get sea-weeds from the sea shore, oyster-shells, old bones, horns, &c. Dead animals are of great value. The offall from a slaughter house, worthless scraps of hides, bones, etc. should be used only with large quantities of common soil or of some other solvent. Not one in a hundred turns to the best account the contents of prives, hog-pens, sonp-suds, and other kinds of waste.

Pardon us for asking why will you tax your olf so severely by neglecting any of these modes of improving your lands? It may be only such neglect that keeps you in poverty; and though you enter upon the work with many painful doubts in relation to the result, we will assure you against loss from any such operations, if conducted with tolerable discretion.

Now is the time to commence this system of operation for the next year. On every leisure day, let the time be occupied in these preparatory labors. Every hour thus spent is worth something, and will tend to fill your purse at the time of Almost all farmers sadly neglect their barn-yard manures. Were these properly cared for, their value, as a whole, would be more than doubled, Having thus suggested the means by which manures may be provided, the next inquiry is, how and where shall they be used? Perhaps we are unable to give the information that many would desire.

Perhaps you have an enclosure that for many years produced large crops, and you just look on and watch your opportunity to take from it the most you could get, returning nothing to it. It may be that it is so situated that it is almost able to take care of itself, like much of the interval on the Connecticut, which is annually enriched by being overflowed. If this is so, we should labor to hasten this process of improvement, and should do all in our power to get this soil back to the condition of a fertile field. When this is accomplished, take the next promising lot, leaving the more desperate eases to the last. When you plough your slayed grounds, fill in without stint a sandy compost. This need not be a costly job, but generally is practicable for the poorest farmer. If you have a boo y meadow, a thorough ditching will be a part of the process necessary to recaim it, while the material thus thrown out is exactly what some other soil most needs. | emity. Compensations are not found only in the structures of animals, but they wear in almost every farm the world over .- Plough, Loom and Anvil.
