SKILL IS CAPITAL.

Hiram Yeazio was a plain, good hearted, honest Farmer's boy, Whose parents lived on a farm where his grandfather was born, and bulf a dozen miles from Agusta, Me. With a good common school education, and a natural aptitude, Hiram was considered at the age of twenty to be a very promising young man and was certainly a great service to his father, on the farm. Old Mr. Venzie was comfortably situated as to pecuniary means; first because his wants were few, and secondly, because his throwing in the machinery. land very nearly supplied them all. But when Hiram asked his father to advance him some small amount with which to commence busihis inability, and wondered that his son could not content himself on the farm, as his father and grandfather had done before him.

The truth was, that Hiram had from boyhood, and during all his school hours, been the intimate friend and companion of pretty Lucy White, the squire's daughter, and this -childish-friendship-had-ripened with years in-, to love. Lucy's father understood the position of affairs perfectly, between the young people, but never interfered, until one day when Hi ram took the old gentleman one side, and asked for Lucy as his wife, old squire White as he was universally called, replied kindly, but firmly, that Hiram must first acquire some trade, and means enough to support Lucy, before he could give his consent, to such an arrangement. The future looked blank to-Hi ram, therefore, for he was but a poor farmer's boy.

Lucy was a gentle and lovely girl of nineteen, as intelligent as she was pretty; she loved Hiram sincerely, but she was too sensible to sit down with him and pine over the bituation of affairs. She was a practical Yankee girl, and her advice to Hiram was sound and loving.

'Go,' said she, 'to Boston or New York,-You are active, good looking, intelligent and industrious; the very characteristics that command place, I should say, in a large city, and see if you do not find the means of earning such wages as shall help you to lay by some thing. I, too, will be industrious, in the meantime, and what little I can save shall go to make the necessary sum for the purchase of a snug little house for us.'

Hiram kissed his little schoolmate, and promised her that she should never for an -hour be out of his mind, soon gathered a small sum together, and with the blessing of his father and mother, he took the cars for Boston. It was his first visit to a large city, and at the outside he was almost bewildered; but seeking economical lodging he begait at once to look about bimself for employment. This he found it hard to obtain, but he was daily growing more and more conversant with city life and ways, and he wrote every few days to Lucy-a digest of observations-and-fortunes.-A fortnight, or three weeks in Boston made fearful inroads into his slender purse, and at had erected on one of the benches, and to the suggestion of some new acquaintences he determined to go to New York.

Here he passed some two weeks with various adventures, but without finding an, hour of paying occupation. He wandered everywhere, observing and searching out places. inquiring freely of all, until at the close of the third week he had but a single dollar left in his pocket, and felt for the first time nearly disheartened. In this mood he strolled through one of the up town cross streets above Union Park, and found his attention attracted by the operation of a steam saw mill, which he entered and quietly watched the business of. He saw a small but efficient engine driving four saws fed by four men, while there stood at a desk hard by, one evidently the delighted at his new acquaintance, who took manager of the establishment.

there were large piles of excellent lumber in worth half his business and more. Mr. Hugd the building, an article he was familiar with from childhood, and he watched the process of tatingly kept his promise, instaling Hiram in sawing it up, carefully observing to what pur; the business with one half the profits. pose the wood was put, and saw a couple of hands in a further part of the shop engaged in Hiram wrote to his faithful Lucy, and how dove tailing the pieces together, and forming she encouraged him in return, and how the the lumber into boxes of various sizes. He business proved exceedingly prosperous, consumed so much time, and was so minute in and how it was enlarged, and Hiram his observation, that at last the proprietor found himself at the end of a twelve came up to him and addressed him pleasant- month worth some two thousand dollars; and marked to Hiram.

Yes. I have seen a good deal of lumber in my days, and I was calculating how much his shoulders, and her kind old mother said you probably used in this way.'

We use a good many thousand feet every week.'

'So I should think, and best number ones

lumber is 'up' now ' 🔩

Rather heavy far that purpose, I should say,' added Hiram.

Well, they are rather heavy, but we can't get boards sawed any different, they are down to the lowest guage of the lumbering mills,'

Hiram looked thoughtful, hundled the boxes, examined the saws, talked good common sense jour ney is healthy for little Hiram n business style to the man, and at last lie said, half seriously, half in jest:

'You don't want a partner, do you?'

"Why, no, not exactly; though if I had one who would put in a couple of thousand dollars, and would take hold heartily himself, I would not mind sharing the thing with him and

'I haven't got any money,' said Hiram; 'but will give you an idea about this matter, and will take hold and "give my time, in a way ness, the good old man frankly acknowledged that I think it will be worth as much as the sum you name, in a short time provided you will give me half the business.".

"I like the way you talk,' sa'd the man, nostly; but this is such and odd proposts tion!

You say you pay twenty four dollars a housand for the boards?" Yes.

Supposing I bring them down to twelve once, and make neater and better boxes for our purpose ?!

'If you can do that I will share with you at once, for my fortune would be made.' 'Will you give me the chance to try the thing after my own fancy, for one day, say commencing to morrow morning?"

'Yes,' said the man, after a moment's liesitation. I can see no harm, though I am to be away to morrow forenoon '

After a little more talk, and a careful understanding that there should be no experiment ried that should risk the machiner, Mr. Hurd, the box maker, gave orders to his neople that Veazie was to be obeyed on the following forenoon, the same as though he were himself to give the orders, and that he should return at noon.

Hiram at once took off his cont, measured one of the saws and asked if it was the largest?

He was told that it was; this he was at first sorry for, but still carefully taking his measures upon a piece of paper, he soon disappeared. He remembered a hardware store not far pistant, which he had passed that very after noon; to this he repared and selected a circular saw, twice as large as any Mr Hurd had in his shop, and of a different make in the teeth; he also got some braces and bolts of a certific to the saws at first ing finished in the most elegant-manner, containing His ing finished in the store promo. It was about twelve o'clock noon on the following day, when Mr. Hurd returned to his shop where he found Hiram Venzie in his shirt sleeves and with a pair of 'overalls' on, at work before a large splitting saw which he which he had applied the steam power. He was splitting the boards, which were fully thick enough to admit of it, and thus was making the boards produce just twice as many Boxes as heretofore, with an equal amount of labor; since those who finished them up into boxes after they were sawed could work enough faster with theithinner lumber to make up for the occupation of one hand to tend the splitting saw.

Mr. Hurd looked on with astonishment; already were a score of boxes and more manufactured of the new thickness, and they were actually more valuable, as the thickness, was ample for all purposes of strength, and the weight was reduced one half. He was also hold of his work so handily, and above all he Hiram felt a strong interest in what he saw; felt that he had at once given him an idea was an honest and faithful man, and unhesi-
