carrot, parsnip, etc., as the should be fresh. In the early cultivation of root crops, tools for the disturbance of the immediate surface should be frequently used, so that weeds cannot become of such size as to require hand-work. When this is thoroughly done in the early part of their growth, much labor will be saved, while the amount of crop will be materially augmented.

When guano or phosphates are used, they should be applied in small quantities at each disturbance of the soil, rather than in large quantities before the sowing of the seed. Grass and grain crops requiring top-dressing, should have -in-the soil, and thus prevent loss by evaporation of the more volatile portions. In many'cases we have known the application of one hundred pounds of Nitrogenized Super-phosphate per acre, to increase the hay crop one ton per acre; and grain so top-dressed in the early spring, always pays a large profit beyond the cost of the fertilizer.

In selecting plants to be put out in early spring, give preference to those raised in the fall and kept in cold frames during winter. They are superior to hot-bed plants, as they are not checked by the transplanting ; and unusual frosts such as sometimes occur after the commencement of spring will not injure them. Thus cabbages, letfuce, cauliflower, broceoli, etc., may be ready for market when raised from cold-frame plants, one month earlier than from thotbed plants, and the high prices obtained for early vegetables fully warrants the ķ extra cost. Indeed the cauliflower and broccoli cannot be forced forward from hot-bed plants' so as to complete their growth before the extreme hot weather, and if not ready for market before such, time, they will not head so as to give a large' flower or compact head.

Those who have no constructed their hot-beds may as well do so. - Lima beans may be started in reverse sods placed
