FREMONT.

OR, THE RIDE OF THE ONE HUNDERD.

[The following sketch, says The Evening Post, is from the pen of one of the many who career of Col. Fremont as the deliverer of California, and who became acquainted with the incidents he describes upon the spot, and from the lips of parties who witnessed them. They show that Frement made "a good run" once, and will go far to satisfy those who are open to conviction that he can do it again:]

-- In the early part of the year 1847 business called me to Alta California. Having been long a resident on the Pacific coast, and being familiar with the language and customs of the people, I was selected to effect a large contract of hides for one of our eastern firms, the probably known. Barely pulling bridle to trade being marty paralized at the time by the war then in progress between our country and Mexico; where a handful of noble men were accomplishing deeds which have given them a place in history by the side, of Leonidas and his braves. The Californians had be come to us a desideratum; although their mineral wealth still slumbered, waiting for them they toresaff the saidles, and placing that enchanter of modern days, Yankee enterprise, their splendid harbors, the contigility of our possessions in Oregon, and the faculties for trade with China, were a sufficient incentive. Commodure-Stockton had hurried up from Cullao in the frigate Congress and General Kearney had crossed the plains from the Missouri River, with a force of armed hunters, for the purpose of taking the country and holding it it as a gage for a satisfactory trea-

The native Californians, who had long ground beneath the imposts of a distant Government and venial Governors, had themselves invited our overtures, but a few of their leaders, with a deadly hatred toward the Yaukees, and hope of personal reward from Mexico; were assidnously endeavoring to stir-the, people up to a revolution many cases with too great success. Manuel Castro, a woulthy and influential ranchero, noted for his determined opposition to all change, and enmity to the Gringos," had arranged for an attack on the Pueblo los Angeles, the headquarters of Kearney, held by a small force of marines and vol. unteers. His agents were in all parts of the country, inflaming the inhabitants and urging them to join him. By some means his plan leaked out....

I was at this time at the ranch of my old friend, General Martinez Vallejo, on the Sonoma Creek; my companion was Capt. Dwho has since espoused one of our host's daughters. Vallejo was one of the largest landholders in California, owning some sixty square miles, with forty thousand head of cattle and several hundred horses, cattle and horses at that time being a man's available wealth. He had been formerly Military Governor of the country, and was considered fair spoil by our people, though in justice I must state that he was kindly disposed toward the Americans. The house was a subtantial edifice of two sto ries, surrounded by a corrall, with a stout gateway; the household consisted of some twenty persons.

We had all retired to rest, and were wrapped in slumber, when the loud barking of dogs and hallowing of men aroused us suddenly from our dreams. Expecting an attack from the bear party (a band of lawless desperadoes who infest the country,) all rushed to the courtyard, armed as well as the time permitted, and in costumes the most picturesque, as primitiveness is usually considered so. The General, sabre in hand, came last; he challenged the intruders with:

" Quien es lu ?" (Who is there.)

· Americanos e amigos, abra la pueata". (A. mericans and friends, open the gate,) was the response, a blow accompanying the words that made the floor shake again.

The demand was perforce complied with; and a band of some fifty men were presented to our view, mounted and arrayed as trappers | fight for a time longer against inevitable rate. and hunters, and armed to the teeth. Foremost among them, on a black mustang, was a small, sinew, dark man, evidently their leader, his "Life of Washington," dwells on the pewith "an eye like Murs to threaten and command," a countenance axpressive of the grat-

there before the outbreak, for that I need these horses; for I must be in at the death." " But the distance; six hundred miles," said D "The roads"

"I shall do it," he replied, and turned away to supervise his arrangements.

In half an hour they departed as uncoremoniously as they came, taking with them some were fascinated by the brilliant and dashing three hundred horses, and leaving us astounded at this raid, to wonder if we were yet awake, or whether it was an unsubstantial

"Los diablos," exclaimed the General, "they have even taken my wife's saddle-horse!" so thoroughly had Fremont's lieutenant executed

From Sonoma to Yerba Cuena, the little number where now stands the queen city of the Pacific, San Francisco, he augmented his stock to the number of fifteen hundred, commenced one of the most peculiar ruces for a fight ever devour a steak out from the quarter of a source dead bullock, driving before them their spare horses-on, on they went. The reads, at all times bad, at this season were horrible-fifty miles being a hard day's journey even for a Californian.

As their exhausted beasts dropped under them on others, hurried on, leaving the poor animals to be devoured by the cayotes, or recover, as chance might bring about. Ever at the head, the last to dismount, and the first to lenp into the saddle, was this mountaineer. this companion of Kit Carson! this pioneer of empire! Framont! Rurely speaking but to arge on his men, or to question some-passing native, taking the smallest modicum of refreshment, and watching while others snatched a moment's repose, was he wrapped up in his project and determined to have some of the in the contract fight.

Through San Pablo, and Monterey, and Josepha they dashed like the the phantom riders of the Hartz Mountains, startling the inhabitants, and making the night watcher cross himself in terror as their band flew on. The River Sacrificios was renched, swellen by the rains, it rolled on, a rapid, muldy stream :-his men paused.

"Forward, forward!" cried he, and dashed in himself; the struggle was a fierce one, but his gallant mustang breasts the ourrent, and he reaches the opposite shore in safety; his men after a time join him, two brave fellowfinding a watery grave, and many horses being carried down the stream; but nothing can now stop him-the heights adjacent to the Puebla appear-now a smile might be seen on the mplacable visage of the leader-'tis the sixth day and the goal is won !...

With ninety men on the last of his caravan of horses, he fell like a thunderbolt on the Mexicans, The day was with them; the band of stout hearts guarding the preside, taken by surprise, and not having the advantage of the Mexicans in regard to horses, were beginning to waver. But cheer up, cheer again-succor is at hand. On come those riders of Fremont; -nothing can withstand their shook. With shouts of triumph they change the battle to a rout. The field is won!

The rout was a complete one; and had not Fremont's men been utterly exhausted, none would have escaped. So ended the ride of the one hundred.

I would state that the government with their usual speed in such matters, passed an approprintion to satisfy General Vallejo and others for their losses, six years after.

This put a virtual end to the war, for though they again made a stand at the San Pascal, headed by Pico, still they were dispirited, and Gen Kearney with his mounted men defeated them with great loss. The governorship of the country being decided, which had long been a source of trouble between Kearny, Stockton and Mason, affairs became more set tled, and the American force now largely augmented, was placed on such a footing as to soon crush the head of rank rebellion," and Pico and Castra fled to the lower country, to mand," a countenance expressive of the gratest determination, and a bearing that, notwithstanding his rough dress, stamped him as one books show, was "careful of small things," born to command—to lead.

This was Fremont.

"I am an officer of the United States," said he; "I am on my way to Los Angelos; I must have horses."

"But—" said Vallejo.

"I said Sir, I must have them; you will be recompensed by my Government. I order you Sir, to deliver to my men what horses you may have in corral."
