that the tap root of the corn plant descends beyond 4 feet in depth, and that its lateral roots extend from row to row, will readily perceive the utility of deep plough ing and theorough pulverization, as aids to healthful feeding. Again, experience teaches us all that such preparation of the soil has the double effect of enabling it to stand-drought and wet better than when under skim ploughing and indiferent pul verization.

results. We say this, notwithstanding the dread entertained by many, of turn-ing up the poison till, as the advocate of ploughing only three or four inches in depth term it. The more deeply you penetrate the earth the greater is the capacity you confer upon it to drink in the rains, and to economize the organic elements of the rains, of the air, and of the been paid to the pulverization of the in-

Seventhly. We believe that the culti vation of corn should commence from the time the plants are three inches in height and be continued at short intervals until the crop is laid by; that no weeds or grass should be permitted to grow beside the corn plants, or in the rows between them, from the time the latter come up, until their culture is completed, hence the necessity for early and frequent cultivation.

But although we are the advocates of deep preparation of the soil, we are not the plough. Now then, if the preceding proposition be admitted—and we honestly believe that they ought to be-we will be euabled to arrive at these important facts in corn growing, viz: 1. That manure, and plen-ty of it, is essential to ensure a good crop -2. That to ensure a very large yield there must be the requisite number of stalks on the field,---3- That the cultivation must be commenced early and be frequently repeated, in order that the plants may be kept perfectly clean, and the carth opened to atmospheric influen-ces. In a word, the whole mystery of growing a good crop of corn may be summed up in these words:manure riber ally-plough deep-pulverize the soil thoroughly-cultivate cleanly

As we have often given formu'as, prese ribig kinds and quantities of mu nure to manure an rere of corn land we will not repeat then here; but, would rcommend that every corn planter who may have the means convenient, n) mat ter how well he may have manured his corn field previously to ploughing in his manure to manure his crop in the hill also Such topical applications assist the ger mination of the seed corn, and pushes the plants forward in the early stage of their growth—two very important con-siderations: It is not material whether these applications be made in the hill at at the time of planting the corn, for on the hill after the corn is dropped and cover d.
