This subject is one that will bear frequent repetition; for if by it we can impress upon every farmer the full importance of taking proper care of his implements and tools we shall be doing a very material service to him. The annexed article, from the Country Gentleman, is to the point, and should be read by every-

Every farmer and gardener should remember that tools are more rapidly injured by exposure in summer than at other seasons of the yeer .- The hot sun cracks them, opens crevices in the wood, which the dew and rain fill, and thus deoay goes on rapidly, while they are warped, distorted and weakened.

There are two remedies which must be jointly applied to prevent the great loss which many farmers suffer by this ex-posure of tools:

1. Makes a list of all tools, implements, carts, &c., and write it largely andplainly on a large sheet of stiff pasteboard or on a painted board prepared for this purpose. One column may be for hoes, spades, iron rakes and other of the smaller iron tools. Another may embrace hay-rakes, scythes, ladder, &c. A third may include chains, crowbars, &c A fourth, plows, harrows, scrapers and barrows. A fifth, carts, reapers, drills and larger machines.

2. Every day at evening 'as regularly as the cows are milked and supper eaten, run over this list and see what tools have been used that day and see that all are in their places. Once a week examine every one more particularly, and see that it is in good condition and put away bright and clean, and not coated and clogged with dirt. Unless this regular review is made, and all workmen are made responsible for the tools, they use. and understand that it is expected of them to house their tools every night, many will be injured by exposure at a loss far-greater than all this trouble; many will ultimately be lost; and lastly, and by far the greatest evil, will be the hours expended in hunting for those which have been misplaced, with work hurrying, men standing idle, and teams delayed, in anxious and vexatious searches, while every one will carnestly protest. that he "did't have it last," and "never lost anything."

"Why, Texpected to use it again in the morning, and I didn't think it worth while to bring it in just for one might." But it rained the next day, the field was too wet to work again that week, and the next week this man was absent on the day it was wanted, and no one else knew where to find it, and we were all delayed over an hour hunting for it, which threw several other jobs out of time and order; while the time occupied in brining in the rol would not have been two minutes. .

Many farmers have expended more than five hundred dollars on the different implements they use; and they are broken, decayed or worn out in one fourth cared for-that is, four hundred out of the five hundred are sunk by careless ness. A single day of warping in the sun does not injure them "much," it is true; and a single night's exposure to rain or heavy dow, in filling up the cracks the sun has made, may be equally small damage, but a repetition day after day, w ek after week, and year after year, rapidly loosens the joints and deepens the decay, until some extra strain upon them gives the finishing stroke.

Keeping tools well painted will make much difference in their durabillity on the long run .- The paint should be of a light color, so as not to heat in the sun's rays. Those parts, as for instances the fe loes of wagons and cart wheels, which are much exposed to moisture s the more frequently painted. A vessel of prepared paint (with a closly fitting lid, to prevent evaporation,) should alw ys be kept to be used in painting tools on rainy days.

The coarser tools, &c., such as harrows h y-rakes, &c., will be benefited nearly as much by frequent whitewashing with li ae as by painting. Apply the lime wash when they are well dried, so that the pores may absorb the lime freely, and the greatest benefit will result. The white color, preventing licating in the sun, will be a material advantage. An experianced painter has given it as his pinion that whitewashing the coarser articles of the farm, and doing it as ofter as once a year, will be quite as beneficial as coating with oil paint, while it will be many times cheaper.

REMEDY FOR DAMP WALLS.

On all sides we meet with the complaint that stone and brick buildings are damp, and the air within them unwhole-This is the case, especially, where the soil on which such walls rest is wet, or where the buildings are surrounded by , thrubbery and trees. To meet this difficulty, it is sometimes suggested that the cellar floors should be covered with a cement of water lime, laid over a coating of coarse gravel; and that the cellar should pe lathed and plastered overhead. This we think a good suggestion, having tried it several years in our own dwelling with excelent results.

It has also been proposed that the sides and top of the walls should be cesmented, so as to prevent the absorption of moisture from the earth below into the wal's of the superstructure. We boult whether this would remedy the difficulty. Instead of trying to make the walls impervious to water, it would be better to put some kind of non-conductor between the walls and the occupied apartments. The confined air between the plastered ceiling of the cellar, just referred to, and the floor of the lower story, is such a non conductor, and preserves the lower rooms from the hurtful dampness rising from the cellar. Place, then, a similar non-conducter between the side walls of each apartment and the room itself. This can be done either by making the hollow, or by "furring off" an inch or two on the inner side of the wall. One inch of confined air, in such a situation, will keep any room / warm and dry.

We hope to see the long prevailing fashion of cheap wooden buildings gradnally give way, before the English custoni of erecting durable structures of brick and stone. And, for this reason, we take every opportunity to remove prejudices against such structures.

Be kind even in your reproofs and reserve them till morning. No one can sleep well who goes to bed with a flea in
