INVITED TO DINE. The too frequent habit of extending mere formal invitations is well rebuked in the fol-lowing anecdote of M. Vivier, the eminent lowing anecdole of M. Vivier, the eminent physician, celebrated for his ready wit, his skill on the cornet, and his close intimacy with Ressini. He had hardly arrived in Paris on his return from his summer travels when he was invited to dine with Mons. B..., a musi-cal amateur and rich capitalist. After the re-best the master and mistress of the house said to their presenties intert. "He on the one side-she on the other." I mused on, half sorrowfully, until at length I have on, half sorrowilly, und at length-I said, speaking unconsciously, out loud-"Perhaps I could have, stood the children if it wern't for thinking that she had loved some-body else. She'd be looking back, all the time, and comparing me with No. 1."
