evening, and all delighted to hang upon her sweet strains, which now, though lost to earth, aid to swell the cherub chorus of the heavenly home. She has gone now to join her brothers in a fairer, purer clime; and they to ether re visit in spirit, the home of sorrow which they have left!

We mingle our sympathies with the afflicted parents and relatives, in their bereavement of a most lovely child. There is, however, much comfort for the mourning ones; for they sorrow not as those who have no hope. Their loss is sweet Ida's gain. God has merely re-called His own; and in doing so, he may seem to deal harshly with you. But "it is well with the thild!" As the rose bud, she was blighted in the first bursting of beauty. Beautiful as the dew-drop she passed away. Her baby-couch she will never press again; her little seat is now left vacant; her sweet voice is now hushed; her lovely face, unfurrowed by care or guilt, you shall never again behold in this vale of tears; the footprints of her hurried steps to school and to play are now erased from earth; and you are left to mourn her loss in the chamer of forrow and tears. The curtain of your fondest hepse has dropped; and soon the flowers of spring will bloom on the grave in which da now sleeps in Jesus. With what rapture did you watch the smile which once played upon her herebecks; and oh, then you antedsted the joys of youth and the conforts of declining age! But oh!

"Death found strange beauty on that pollshed brow," And cheel if our Here was a time for every search of the search of the " Death found strange beauty on that polished brow, And dashed it out,-Here was a tint of rose On cheek and lip, He touched her voius with ice,

And the rose faded!" And the rose faded!"

But, though gone thus from you, she has gone to God. Death cannot steal her from Heaven. Learn then, from this beceivement, the instability of all earthly possessions. See what a phantom is human hope! See what is life! Prepure for a blessed reunion with Ida in that better world where s grows are neverfelt and death never comes; and learn to be ready for "the last evening," and leave your "house set in order," for thou shalt surely die!"
