Ottumwa. Iowa, Aug. 7, 1869.

The day has been everything that could be desired for observation. The clouds of the morning were succeeded by a perfectly clear sky. At noon, with a dry wind and no haze, Prof. Alexander, chairman of the National Academy of Sciences, pronounces the eclipse the finest of the three totals he has observed. His party, including Gen. Halstean, were finely posted for observation, and, in addition to the usual astronomical observations, investigated the heat of the corona by means of the thermo-electric pile, without positive results. The rest, however, which this observation gave the eye, enabled him this observation.
