faces, and deep black furrows ploughed through the exploded stone work were tipped with a brilliant ornamental gilding, more perfect than any over produced by the artistic hand of a master gilder Away into the dark recesses of thes once beautiful specimens of architectura skill, through their now vacant windows streamed the rays of the reflected light until fancy dispelling the horror of the reality, converted them into the fabled liaunts of the fairies of romance. Some festive celebration appeared in progress, and as one listened for the strains of en chanting music, it seemed "a dream, although not all a dream."

Approaching the river, upon the West and North sides, mountains of coal were covered with billows of tempestuous fire. Above the bituminous, rose a crimson colored flame, crowned with waving inky black plumes, and as the wind parted it, and blow high into the air its sharp, spiral jets, the back ground resembled a hideous impenetrable cavern, whose entrance way was guarded by flaming swords, and glittering spears Fleecy waves of purple and white played sportively above the anthracite, nov hiding and anon reappearing in fantastic and frolicksome revelry. Shapeless Long and Square Shawls, heaps of grain, rising from the remains of towering elevators, overrun with seas of liquid fire, glowing embers of acres of destroyed lumber, burned into brilliancy by the steady blowing gale, the carmine dyed noble ruins, over which blew clouds of surging light brown smoke, the whole enveloped in a framework of golden magnificence, combined in presenting picture, that language, wielded by the most graphic of pens, could not describe, nor the hand of the limner decorate in its appropriate and variegated coloring. By daylight on the morning of the tenth instant, the smoke had lifted, and ere the sun had fairly risen, crowds of people were winding their devious ways through once familiar and busy streets Looking north, from Harrison street, as far as the unaided eye could bring ob jects within its range, there stretched out a vast expanse of as grand ruins as the modern world has ever seen. Rambling among the dizzy walls, here stands the gracefully arched entrance-way of the Bigelow House, with but a remnant of its chaste front looming above it: there a portion of the Corinthian architecture of the Honore Block, with pillar upon pillar, mounting heavenward. while sections of its galvanized iron cornice swaying idly in the wind, chant dolorous requiem in memory of its extinct grandeur. Columns of iron lying lazily in the rubbish, relieved of their lately ponderous burdens, are now improvised flues from which issue curling blue smoke from smouldering fires beheath, or intermingled with binding rods and beams of the same material, are gathered together in "confusion worse confounded." One tall chimney marks the former location of the Tremont House, a few partition walls, that of the Sherman House, while opposite the ruins of the latter, in mournful though proud prominence, the walls of the Court House with their stony mottoes of "Peace," "Justice," "Truth," "Un-ion" and "Liberty," remain firmly and secure some of the good barseated upon their foundation stones. Scattered throughout this dreary waste, rise pointed gables, artistic finials, and interlacing arches-the blackened relics of the architecture of churches and cathedrals, whose tall spires and musical belfries are sleeping in their own fragments, the flowing tracery of whose Gothic and Catherine wheel windows is obliterated, and whose door ways are clogged with the wrecks of entablatures and capitals, and the plane and fluted of the elements for countless ages of * past time. Lofty flues of former manufactories dot the scene and about them lie strewn the worthless matter of costly and complicated machinery. Wherever a wooden building stood, nothing but ashes, and a few brick of the fire flues remain. Safes are scattered throughout the ruins, in numbers almost countless. Parties age working day and night in removing them from the hotzubbish, in hope of them from the hot rubbish, in hope of saving some portions of their contents Few have proven their worth, and carned the boasted title of "Fire Kings." Metal valuables are generally tarnished or melted, papers crisped, and as brittle as the most delicate glass, and all writing, save lead pencil marks, rendered wholly illegible. The vaults were nearly all in sound condition, and preserved their contents as devoid of blemish, as when taken from them daily, in the ordinary course of business. One notable exception is that, of the Custom House, in which, from the inferiority of its con struction, over $1,000,000 in greenbacks were destroyed, and nearly half a million were destroyed, and nearly half a million in gold and silver melted in a solid mass.

The civil authorities of the city, after long deliberation, placed the police in the long defideration, placed the police in the long desideration. in gold and silver melted in a solid mass. the hands of General Sheridan, under the orders of the Mayor. Rumors of incenish work, and hanged or shot, kept the people in a continued state of feverish excitement. The arrival of regular and volunteer troops, gave the city the appearance of a military encampment, and brought forcibly to mind the streets of DRY GOODS Richmond, at the close of the war. The blue of the regular forces contrasted strangely with the gray of the Michigan State cardets, and the uniform of Prussian infantry, with their spiked helmets, recalled the stories of the occupation of Paris.

Martial law, in a city where the civil authorities were in a state of lawful organization, was widly rumored as having been declared, and the most ridiculous and whimsical notions were entertained by a part of the populace as to the status of the city, and asserted military governments. Sheridan had done this, and Sheridan had done that, either of which thing had Sheridan done, would have made him a contemptible fool, and sullied his well-carned reputation for coolness of behavior, and in.

His conduct, however, in the blowing up of buildings, assuming danger in behalf of the people, as also his interest and energy displayed in protecting property, repairing to the spot from which each alarm of fire was spot from which each alarm of fire was rung, during the week of excitement, and manfully laboring to stay the spread of the flames, has earned for him, (and doubtless he will receive,) the warmest thanks of a generous people. Each block-organized a special patrol, only to give his name and his place of residence to insure—him an escort from one to another, until he was safely housed under his own roof. Alarms of fire were of frequent occurrence, and the old fashioned method of forming lines and passing buckets of water from the and passing buckets of water from the P. B.—Joseph Kids, $1 (0).
