of the confederacy. In our simplicity, we might hope to earn a solid and enduring suposed that the Union was, on all hands, fame. to be forever conceded to be, not only the surest guaranty of our national prosperity, but that it was in fact a political necessity without which we could scarcely exist as a nation. These however, it seems, were but the flattering dreams of a distempered fancy. We have lived to see the day, when the value of the Union is not only discussed in newspapers, and debated in private circles, but when it is the subject of grave deliberation with some, and of angry debate and violent denunciation with others of our statesmen in the halls of Congress. The subject has now as sumed a form so grave, as to demand the attention of every citizen who loves his country.

We need not refer to the moving cause of this unfortunate movement. It is sufficiont to say, that on the subject of negro slavery the North and the South do not agree; and many politicians, both at the North and the South, seem to regard this disagreement as a sufficient reason for dissolving the Union. Thus a northern party and a southern party have grown up, maintaining diametrically opposite opinions on the question of slavery. So fierce has the conflict of opinion now become stimulated as it has been by fanatical and a MAVING obtained a grant from the G. D. the Southern States, for example, North guished speakers. If we must have sectional parties, let us have a Western party equally exempt from the fanaticism of the North and the violence of the South, devoted, not to the propagation of mere abstractions, but to the preservation of the Union in all its integrity. In our judgment, the time has arrived when the West should make itself heard and felt upon this subyou in any crusade against Southern rights or Southern prejudices, if you choose to term them such, but we are resolved to save you from the consequences of your yours—it is a common fund belonging to us all, bequeathed to us as a common inheritance from a glorious ancestry.
