LIFE.

I marked you barque, as o'er the deep She swiftly glided on;
And saw her dash with quicken'd leap,
The spray around her flung—She seem'd as fair as Hope could be,
And danced in triumph o'er the sea!

I saw her hence, a shapeless thing She tossed on ocean, to and fro, As o'er her prow Hope could not fling One smile to light her painful woe; She seem'd so frail that might could save Her beauty from a watery grave!

'Tis thus with man—he presses o'er The surface of life's mimic sea;
And, restless, seeks some fancied shore, There to be blest, there to be free;
But storms and clouds his hopes o'ercast,
And bliss is swallowed in the blast!

THE WAGER, OR, THE TWO WEDDING RINGS.

CHAPTER I.

"Love you, Charley?—no, not a bit!— What should you put such a ridiculous idea into your head? Why you are a mere boy!"

"I am not, Ellen, I assure you. I have not a boyish feeling about me; and, for my appearance, I am sure I do not look like a boy in the least. Have I, indeed, cultivated this moustache with so much pains for nothing? Am I not nearly twenty-one? and, above all, do I not love you devotedly?"

The roguish little Ellen made no answer, but, began to sing—

"A little boy went out to shoot one day, And carried his arrows and bow;
For guns they are dangerous things for play In the hands of children you know."
"Nonsense, Elly."

"A little bird sat on a tree, And whistled and said, 'you can't shoot me!'
"And neither can you, Mr. Charley," said Ellen, laughing.

"I don't know about that," said Charley, saucily. "I think little maiden, that you are more than half in love with me already, and I will see if I cannot make you quite so."

"Just here how the song goes on," said Ellen.

"Only wait," said the boy, "till I get close enough,
And see if I don't shoot you through."
"Don't think," said the bird, "I'm not up to snuff."
To sit and be shot at by you!"

Charles laughed in spite of himself, but returned to the charge.

"But tell me seriously, Elly, why you don't love me, and I will remove heaven and earth to be more agreeable to you—Tell me what you wish for a lover."

"Well, Charles, in the first place, my lover must be a handsome man, six feet feet high at least, (you want full an inch of the standard,) then he must have a great bushy beard, (excuse me dear Charley, but your little moustache is rather a miserable substitute) then he must waltz divinely, sing enchantingly, and love me as well or better than you do."

"Pshaw!" said Charles, impatiently, "If you had such a lover, you would not like the grizzly bear one half so well as you do me. I would bet you your wedding ring, that if such an one as you describe were to appear, which is not very likely, you would, after all, tell me that you would take me in preference."

"Tell you so, indeed!" said Ellen, indignantly, "that will I never do, and I willingly accept your wager."

"Very well, Elly, I see you have some yague, romantic dream of some corsair of a lover, and for the present, I stand by a poor chap, but you know I am to set out on my travels to-morrow, and—
My love she's but a lassie yet,
My love she's but a lassie yet;
I'll leave her for a year or two,
And she'll nae be so saucy yet.
Pardon me Elly, you are fond of old songs—good bye!" So saying the gay and handsome young man left the apartment.

The next day Charles came to take leave of Ellen, previous to going to South America, where he expected to sojourn for two or three years. They were both sadder than on the day before, and Ellen's eyes looked very much as though she had been having a 'good cry' before he came.

"Well, Elly," said Charles, after awhile with an effort to be gay, "do you still persist what you said yesterday? don't you love me one bit?"

"Not much," said Ellen faintly.
"And do you still want that whiskerand-o' yours to come and woo and win you?"

"Not much," said Ellen again, "that is to say—"

"Pshaw, Ellen! I see very plainly how the matter stands with you," said Charles. "You are in love with me, I tell you!"

"Indeed I am not, sir," said Ellen, indignantly.

"Indeed I am not, sir," said Charles,
"cover head and ears in love—but you don't know it; and I suppose I must wait patiently till you find it out and tell me so."

"That will never be," said Ellen.
"I have not forgotten our bet, Elly; and when you reject your 'ideal,' and tell me you love me I shall expect you to present me with our wedding ring; but, should you marry your blue beard, I will present you with yours."

"Very well, sir," said Ellen, "I may meet with 'ideal' sooner than you think, though I am but a lassie yet;" and tossed her roguish little head scornfully.

"Well, well, Elly, don't be angry; remember only this, that you have one plain honest hearted lover, who will never forget you—and Elly dear, let me advise you to beware of those fancy lover. Pirates Bandits and Spaniards are to be particularly guarded against, being as all young ladies know, exceedingly dangerous."

CHAPTER II.

Three years passed quickly away.— Ellen had 'come out' and had gained, by her sweetness and vivacity, several sincere admirers; but still the hero, the 'ideal' had not yet appeared. Charles was still retained abroad, and was not expected back for another year at least. Could he have seen the joy with which his letters were received by Ellen, and known that the last was always kept in her bosom and read again, he might have felt pretty well assured of the state of her heart; as it was, he became at times rather despondent.— But, unfortunately, about this time a personage who bid fair to relieve Ellen's romantic dreams appeared in society. He was a Spaniard and a count; he was also handsome and accomplished—and all the girls were in love with him. Ellen heard of nothing but the count for some time before she met with him.

She saw him at last at a party—one of her young friends pointed him out to her.
As she looked towards him, she saw a tall noble looking man, very dark, very handsome, and better still, there was the magnificent beard. Soon afterwards, the count was introduced to her, and after a little conversation, during which the count seemed much agitated, he told her that she so strongly resembled a very dear friend he once had, that he could not look at her without emotion. The suppression of deep feeling on his part was so evident, that Ellen's warm sympathies were excited at once. She became interested in him, more especially as she found that his conversational and intellectual powers quite equalled his sensibility. Her own talents were called forth by his, and she could not but feel that she was appearing to great advantage to the pensive stranger. But soon, sooner than she expected or quite wished, he left her and returned no more. Surely thought Ellen, he will ask me to dance; but no—he returned no more that evening.
Ellen went home a little discontented and vexed. She met him again—but he merely bowed and went on. A few nights afterwards, they met once more at a friends house. Towards the end of the evening, after Ellen had seen him admired and flattered by half the ladies in the room, she was rather surprised when he came and took a quiet seat beside her. They soon fell into a very pleasant conversation.— The count had been in South America.— She ventured timidly to ask if he knew Charles Summers?

"Yes, I have met with him in Valparaiso several times—a fine fellow, and a great pet with the ladies."

Ellen blushed.

"Is he a particular friend of yours?" asked the count.

"Yes—no," Ellen said, "not a very great, not a very particular friend;" and growing very much embarrassed, as she thought she saw a smile on the count's face, she added hurriedly, and blushing deeply, "only a slight acquaintance."

The count seemed well pleased with her answer. He remained beside her some time longer, and afterwards asked her to dance. She could not, of course, be conscious of the eclat of being the partner of the handsomest man in the room—he whose smiles all were seeking but, though pleased and flattered, no mean feeling of triumph over her many rivals entered Ellen's gentle breast.

On the following day the count called, and afterwards they met constantly, and always, as by mutual impulse, they seemed to seek each other's society. The count grew more and more devoted. Ellen was most frequently his partner in the fascinating waltz, and he waltzed superbly.

He invited her to ride, and I confess those rides were dangerous things. The count rode even better than he waltzed, and looked so noble on his proud steed.
As they passed slowly through those beautiful, fresh, heart-warming country scenes and through those long, quiet, shaddy lanes, I will confess the time was perficious. Once in particular, when Ellen's horse was restive, and the count was obliged to soothe and encourage the frightened girl, I will admit that her heart was in great danger. But if the count's heart was in equal peril, he did not show it—he was always calm and imperturbable. Ellen could not decide what his feelings were, but she was almost sure he did not love her. Sometimes, indeed, she thought it quite possible he might; if she only knew, she would know how to act.

CHAPTER III.

One evening after about two months acquaintance with the count, Ellen gave a party. While at her toilet, it must be confessed she consulted her mirror with more than usual care. She could scarcely make her dark hair smooth enough; and she, who generally thought but little of dress, now wavered and debated for half an hour before she could decide between her white crape dress and her pink silk.
The white was at last chosen; and, with a white wreath around her graceful head, she certainly looked very lovely.

The evening advanced, but the count did not appear. Ellen's color rose and faded every time the door opened and closed; but he did not come until she had almost given him up. Ellen spoke to him almost coldly as he greeted; but very soon she felt her displeasure fading away under the charm of his conversational powers.
His manner was so kind, so deferential, so gentle to her, that her heart softened to him almost tenderly.

He was called upon to sing, and as Ellen heard his rich voice so full of feeling, and listened to the impassioned words of his song, she felt a strange, wild joy in her heart. As he ceased singing, his eye sought hers, as though he sung for her alone. She replied by a glance from eyes full of tears. The count was soon again by her side, and he contrived, after a time to lead her through the parlor conservatory into the garden. The night was soft and warm. They both walked along in rather awkward silence. At length the count in a suppressed voice, said—

"Dear Miss Ellen, permit me to say to you one word, and to ask you one question."

Ellen wished to speak, but she could not utter a single word. The count went on—

"I would—I must tell you briefly, but truly, that I love you, and ask if you can —if you do—love me in return?"

Ellen was so agitated that she could scarcely support herself. The count perceiving this, hastily threw his arm around her, as if to support her; then as quickly withdrew it, and, rather embarrassed, offered his arm. Ellen struggled for calmness, but she was greatly agitated. She pressed her hands to her bosom and felt Charles' last letter. She grew more and more undecided. She knew not what to do or what to think. After a violent mental conflict, she said—

"You will think it very strange, but I cannot answer your question; I feel that I do not know my own mind; I cannot decide what I ought to do." She paused; and trembled exceedingly from nervous excitement.

"Do not be agitated," said the count kindly, almost tenderly, "much as I suffer while my fate is undecided, you shall not be hurried in making your decision; take what time you wish to know your own mind; permit me only to ask when I can know your determination."

Ellen hastily named the next day; and, escaping from him ran to her own room to endeavor to compose herself before again appearing amongst her guests.
When she returned to the parlor, the count was not there. Oh, how inexpre-sibly dull and tiresome the time seemed till the company departed!

Ellen passed a sleepless night; but when the count was announced on the following day, she went down to see him with a calm and decided air; but when he came forward to meet her, with his fine eyes full of love and anxiety, she felt her heart sink, and she said quickly, in order not to give herself time to relent—

"It gives me more pain than I can express to feel that I am disappointing so noble a heart as yours; but, I confess to you—and I hope you will pardon me for not sooner knowing my own mind—I feel now that another, unknown even to myself, had my heart before I ever knew

you."

The count grew pale. Ellen went on,
in a faltering voice—

"Believe me, dear friend, when I tell you that I have never known any one whom I regard so highly as yourself, save you—and I am sure that had I never known Charles Summers, I should love
you."

"Charles Summers!" cried the count in a joyful tone; "ah, Elly, dear Elly, you are then my own forever," and he clasped her to his arms.

"Dear Charles," said Ellen, after she had recovered from her surprise, "how blind I was not to have known you sooner though you have so greatly changed. But tell me—why all this disguise and mystery?"

"It was the great change which had taken place in my appearance," said Charles, which induced me to play this masquerade. I remember your old wish for a hero lover, and I determined to see if I could win you in that guise. You see I have now most of the desired requisites—a tall figure, a tolerably handsome face, and, best of all the large beard."

"I see, my friend, you have lost none of your conceit in your travels," said Ellen.

"And could you, Elly, after all, find it in your heart to give up this fine fellow and your countess-ship for your old lover Charles? Ah, dearest, sweetest little Elly, you have lost your bet, for have you not told me to my face that you love me?"

"Not before you told me so, count tho' you were," said Ellen.

"But I claim my wedding ring—the forfeit," said Charles.

"And I mine," said Ellen, quickly—she was going to add, "for I shall marry my 'ideal,'" but she stopped and blushed.

Matters were soon arranged between the lovers, and, friends consenting, they were in due time married, as all such worthy and faithful lovers deserve to be.
One peculiarity only marked the ceremony. After the ring had been placed on the finger of the bride, she herself placed one in return on that of the bridegroom.
Thus happily terminated "The Wager."

How the Spy was Detected.

The Washington correspondent of the Charleston News, says, an ingenious mechanic of Washington has invented a kind of telegraphic hollow bullet, consisting of two parts, screwed together. In this bullet a despatch of several lines written on thin paper can be compressed and then fired from a musket to a considerable distance.
In time of war this contrivance might be made very useful in conveying intelligence into a besieged fortress or city. The screw bullet, however, he adds, is no new thing, as the following account will prove:

In the year 1776 when Gov. George Clinton resided in Albany, there came a stranger to his house one cold winter morning, soon after the family had breakfasted.
He was welcomed by the household, and hospitably entertained. A breakfast was ordered, and the Governor with his wife and daughter, who were sitting before the fire employed in knitting, entered into a conversation with him about the affairs of the country, which naturally led to the inquiry what was his occupation. The emotion and hesitation with which the stranger replied aroused the suspicions of the keen-sighted Clinton. He communicated his suspicions to his wife and daughter, who closely watched every word and action. Unconscious of this, but finding that he had fallen in among enemies, the stranger was seen to take something from his pocket and swallow it. Madam Clinton, with the ready tact of the women of those troubled times, ordered hot coffee to be prepared, and added to it a strong dose of tartar emetic. The stranger delighted with the smoking beverage, partook freely of it, and Madam Clinton soon had the satisfaction of seeing it produce the desired effect. True to Scripture 'out of his own mouth was he condemned.' A silver bullet appeared, which upon examination was unscrewed, and found to contain an important despatch to Burgoyne. Thespy was tried, convicted and executed, and the bullet is still preserved in the family.

A droll anecdote is told of the Neapoliense ambassador, now in London.— At Mr. Lumley's grand fete, he asked to be introduced to Carlotta Grisi, with whose dancing he had been enchanted, at the Opera House. The lady was presented, and the Prince made some remark, which, on being translated, was found to be that "He did not know her with her clothes on."

Curiosity Rewarded.

The other day, a friend of ours, who, though rather smart, in the popular ac-ception of the term, is decidedly vain in his personal appearance, was standing at the steps of the St. Charles Hotel, intently watching the motions of two elean-tantly dressed ladies, who at the moment were passing up the street. After watching them for some time until they disappeared in the distance, he turned round and addressed an acquaintance standing near, asking him if he knew the handsome ladies who had just attracted the attention of the number of admiring gentlemen who were then (it was dinner hour) congregated in that vicinity.—
"Know them? of course I do," replied the person addressed.

"What are their names?"
"They are the Misses——and by the way very fine girls they are, and fortunes too."

"Can't you introduce a friend?" asked the first speaker.

"Well," said the other, "I don't know that I mightn't, particularly as I have heard them speak of you. They said you were a remarkably good looking fellow."

"Really now! did they? I declare you quite flatter my vanity," said our friend, straightening himself a little, giving his shirt collar a little more altitude, and then twisting his delicate moustache with glowed finger. "Did they say anything more?"

"Oh! yes, they said a good deal, but I don't think I can tell you the rest; it would be a violation of confidence, you know, and I am sure they would never forgive me if they should find out that I had betrayed them. Such things should be kept sacred, you know."

This excuse did not by any means satisfy our friend. In fact as always the case when he himself was in question, his curiosity was aroused, he was anxious to know what the ladies had said about him; he couldn't rest till he found out; he coaxed, he persuaded, he solicited, but all in vain, the obstinate disturber of his peace would not give any satisfaction.— At last after exerting every expedient to extract the desired information, our friend invited his companion to take a drink, then a second, then a third, and finally the gong sounded for dinner and found his curiosity ungratified. Seizing his obstinate tormentor by the arm, the inquisitive individual said, "Come, Tom, let's go to dinner, and we'll discuss that matter over some fine champagne."

"With all my heart. I never refused a good offer, and as I know the quality of Mudge & Wilson's champagne, I don't think I can let this opportunity slip."

Up stairs they accordingly went, and seated at the dinner table the cross question was put in operation with redoubled vigor. Claret and burgundy, and champagne were ordered; the most delicate dishes were placed before the possessor of the precious information. But all the temptations failed. He would not tell.— He would not sacrifice his honor by disclosing a private conversation; besides, it might have a bad effect, and in short it was altogether impossible. Our friend, however was not to be discomfited in this way; he continued his attentions and his persecutions till the cloth was removed, till the dessert was placed on the table and demolished, and till at last he and his companion were the only persons remaining. Finally the latter arose, sauntered to the door, and stepped out on the capacious portico, where, tooth-pick in hand, he took a seat in order that he might quietly enjoy the remembrance of his fine dinner. Our friend, though, was not disposed to let the matter drop; he drew up a chair, deliberately sat down and expressed his fixed determination not to stir till he should find out what those ladies had said about him.

"Well," said the other, "if you are resolved, I might as well tell you; though I couldn't have done so before, for fear of spoiling your appetite. Those ladies said that you were a fine looking fellow, and I had to agree with them in that—"

"Well well; what then? You told me that before?"

"Well, in the next place they said it was a pity you were good looking, for you were the greatest simpton they ever knew."

On hearing this reply our friend rose from his seat bowed politely, remembered that he had an appointment at precisely that hour, and retired precipitately. He was not seen about St. Charles before dinner for some time afterwards. The reason we leave the reader to judge.—N.

The Labors of Congress.—Congress has been in session eight months, and it has passed two bills, one to give the franking privilege to Mrs. Taylor, and the other the same privilege to Mrs. Polk.

Singular Vegetable Phenomenon.

The following account of a singular, and perhaps important Vegetable phenomenon, is taken from the Knoxville (Tenn.) Register:

"About this time last year the cane upon several islands in the rivers of East Tennessee, was discovered to be producing small grain, which very much resembled rye, both as to size and shape. It grew in heads and was covered with chaff like that of wheat. The production was then considered remarkable, and so unusual that not even the 'oldest inhabitant' had ever seen anything of the kind. The conjectures respecting the cause of the appearance of this unusual grain were very numerous—many persons (and some of them skilled in botanic learning) supposed that the cane had by some means, been inoculated with wheat.

This year we are told that the cane throughout East Tennessee is bearing in almost incredible quantities, the same grain. At some places it would not be difficult to collect as much as twenty-five or thirty bushels per acre. Some persons owning cane lands have already gathered large quantities of the grain, which they find makes a flour equal in appearance to that of wheat, and equally as palatable when cooked in the form of cakes, &c.— Hogs and fowls eat the grain as it falls from the cane, with the same greediness that they devour any other small grain. Another remarkable feature about the matter is that so soon as the grain begins to mature the cane begins to die, and the indications now are that all the cane in East Tennessee, will die out this season."

Beauty of Jewesses.

It is related that Chateaubriand, on returning from his Eastern travels, was asked if he could assign a reason why the women of the Jewish race were so much handsomer than the men, when he gave the following one:—"Jewesses," he said, "have escaped the curse which alighted upon their fathers, husbands, and sons. Not a Jewess was to be seen among the crowd of priests and rabble who insulted the Son of God, scourged him, crowned him with thorns, and subjected him to infamy and the agony of the cross. The women of Judea believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under affliction. A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a vase of alabaster. The sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. Christ, on his part, extended mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martin's brother Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the woman touched the hem of his garment. To the Samaritan woman he was spring of living water, and a compassionate judge to the woman in adultery. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him; the holy woman accompanied him to Calvary, brought him balm and spices; and weeping, sought him in the sepulchre. "Woman, why weepest thou?" His first appearance after the resurrection was to Mary Magdalene. He said to her, "Mary!" At the sound of his voice, Mary Mag-dalene's eyes were opened, and she answered, "Master." The reflection of some beautiful ray must have rested on the brow of the Jewesses."

Original Anecdote.—A member of our legislature, from one of the interior towns, from the cares of business at home, grew thin and poor in the Calvin Edson sense of the word. At his arrival at the metropolis, the good fare of a Boston Landlord, and the relaxation from busines (every body knows that it is no great affair to say yes or nay in the House of Representatives,) caused him to grow fleshy and corpulent to such a degree as almost to excite the surprise of his brother Legislators. Surprise turned to laughter is the most exciting of all laughter; and it was so in this case, when some incurable wag wrote with chalk upon the back of the member's over coat: "Bal-ter at the expense of the State." This brief explanation of his sudden roundness of countenance and figure, the Honorable member in question unconsciously carried with him nearly a whole day—much to the amusement of his brethren—"at the expense of the State."—Lowell Journal.

A young lady thus writes anonymously, in the columns of an Irish paper:
"For my part, I confess that the desire of my heart, and my constant prayer is, that I may be blessed with a good and affectionate husband, and that I may be a good and affectionate wife and mother. Should I be denied this, I hope for grace to resign myself, but I fear it will be a hard trial for me."
