

men and true," he forfeited the confidence of McDonald, and proved that his professions were mere windy declamations intended only to accomplish the object of his wishes. At the meeting of the convention at Johnstown on the 17th of July, McKinney received what was considered a good nomination—this he declined in a Card published shortly afterwards and pledged himself that he will abide the decision of the next convention and accord to the nominee his hearty support. This convention met, and after considerable difficulty nominated a man who has not "appropriately been styled "the war horse of the party." A man whose Democracy has never been doubted, whose private character has never been sullied by a stain, yet McKinney in his presumption dares to question the validity of his nomination and offered himself as a candidate, asking the support of the democratic party of this district.

Mr. McKinney's "good men and true," not content with defeating the wish of little Cambria at Johnstown, were determined to act independent of her will at Ligonier, and one of them, I am credibly informed, pledged himself to oppose Gen. McDonald's delegates, and support those of Dr. Smith long before he could legally decide upon the relative merits of the two sets of Claimants. And now a few words regarding my own course. The length to which a man in convention should go in order to obey instruction from his constituents, has never been, (I believe,) legally defined; but the general understanding is, that so long as there is a reasonable chance for the success of the man in whose favor you are instructed, so long you would be required to vote for him. This fellow citizens of Westmoreland county, I claim to have done, others may think differently; but of one thing I am certain, every candid, unprejudiced mind will admit that in balloting for Alexander McKinney six times, I fulfilled my instructions. It was evident to every man in the convention, as well as those around, that he could not be the nominee; his "good men and true" were "determined either that he should be nominated, or the convention should be "broken up" without a nominee, as they were unwilling to change ground or make any compromise in order to harmonize the unpleasant state of affairs existing, and as Bedford county had settled down upon one of our firmest and most faithful Democrats, the responsibility of settling the difficulty devolved upon me, and in all sincerity I cast my vote for John Snodgrass, and by that vote he became the legitimate candidate of the Democratic party of the 19th Congressional district. The opinion of Alexander McKinney to the contrary notwithstanding.
