

General Houston.

The hero of San Jacinto, although not much talked of just now, for the Presidency, has, in our opinion, his warlike and penetrating optics fixed upon that distinguished and commanding and pleasant situation. We have no objection to Sam, himself; and would warn the old standing candidates how they unfair them if for he once gets a clever start there will be no such thing as catching him, until he is snugly ensconced in the white house.

The other evening he delivered an address to a Philadelphia audience, which has been spoken of very highly by people and papers of all parties. He made a fine impression upon the citizens of Philadelphia, who generally do the political thinking for about three fourths of our State, including this country. Since the address alluded to was delivered, we observe that the New York City Councils, in anticipation of visit of the General, have generously appointed a committee to tender to him the hospitality of the city, and the use of the Governor's room for the reception of his friends. From these indications, which no doubt mean something, we judge that "old San Jacinto" will interfere with the arrangements of the old, standing candidates for the Presidency. He was the ardent friend of Gen. Jackson, and always possessed his unbounded confidence; he was the pioneer of Texas independence, which was finally established upon the bloody field of San Jacinto; was President of the young Republic; was mainly instrumental in accomplishing her annexation to the United States; is now a Senator in Congress, and is beloved by his constituents, as Old Hickory was by the people of Tennessee. General Houston resembles General Jackson in many particulars; his early life and struggles with poverty; the hardships he had to encounter; his determination, valor and success rewards one of Old Hickory's early career.

A subsequent letter contradicts the report of Mr. O'Brien's attempted escape, for which the writer says there is not the least ground.
