

POBTRY.

From the Pictorial Drawing Room Companion THE LAST FAREWELL. The last farewell I took of thee,

My injured native isle! Was lisped in silent agony, Though soothed by a smile. I smiled, but O, that smile was sad, For gloom was round my heart; And those who thought I then was glad, Knew not the inward part.

I feigned a smile, 'tis true, and cheered 'The friends who flocked around; Friends from my infancy endeared, Who on me never frowned.

And O, their parting words to me, With sighs and tears combined; Although I'm now among the free, Hang heavy on my mind.

And fairest of my sisters, Kate, I still think on the scarf You waved to me that evening, late, When sailing by Clontari; Methinks I still behold the hair, Which played on thy white neck; That I gezed on, until in air You dwindled to a speck.

And well I still remember, then, The cheer my brothers gave; As from the ship I answered them Back o'er the rising wave. And when their voices died away, I still sent cheers behind, Until, o'er Erin's fairest bay, They mingled with the wind.

What sadness filled me, as I gazed On the receding shere; When I my eyes and hands upraised, To tless it evermore.

And still fond prayers, my native land, I offer up for thee, To Him who has the sole command,

And shall forever be. THE following police report, taken from the Philadelphia "Pennsylvanian," might we have several smart youths in this neighborhood:

The watchman presented Master Geo. soon. C. Huntley to the Mayor, with the information that he had formed the acquaintance of Master George last night, while the young gentleman was endeavoring to introduce himself, informally, to some young ladies on Walnut street, who apand manners, and especially a certain ra- ing constantly on hand a supply of kish swagger which he seems to affect, would be more becoming for a person ten or fifteeen years older.
