From Godey's Lady's Book. The Forest Stream.

BY EMILY HERRMANN.

Its pranks are many and sadly wild, (Nay, say not I only dream,) For cometimes it leaps like a playful child, And gayly it dances-and, oft beguiled By its wayward wiles, I have wept and smiled On the banks of this forest stream.

There the ducklings wild in the silver tide Now dip 'neath the sunshine clear; They're skimming the wave, they near my side Nor turn, nor fly, for their instinct guide Hath whispered, "Ye need not fear!"

The crow caws loud in the tree-top high, With his glossy sable vest;

And a "crake" sounds harshly, as, wheeling nigh

O'er the giant woods, with his herald cry, The crane's coming down to rest:

To rest, and to seek in the glancing wave A meal for his awkward young; And well as a fisher the saucy knave Knows each curling eddy, where bright fins lave With the green willow leaves o'erhung.

How checkered and bright the warm summer light

Through the thick forest woof comes down! Here it quivers all day where the clear waters play

Round the elm roots, all ragged and brown.

Right pleasant and safe was the gray squirrel's home

In you eleft of the sycamore tree, Where many a one of the merry wood-folk, Well pleased with the tales of my dear gossip brook, Doth sit down and listen with me.

From Godey's Lady's Book The Dying Child.

BY LLEWELLYN.

In the casement's cooling breeze The happy mother sat at rest: A little child stood on her knees. Gazing towards the glowing west Her eye grew large, and very bright, As the great sun went out of sight-And when she found her "pretty star,"

She heard the sparrows sing at morn, And climbed her chair to watch them well- of The mist float off the fields of corn, And the bee come out of the opening bell. * * * * *

But on her cot she lies again. And a leaden cloud is on her brain; The noon grows dark as evenings are-Trustful, she cries, "Good night, mamma!"

The angel Death stood by and smiled-His shadow rested on her eyes; He'd come to lead the wandering child Up the long pathway through the skies! Her purple lips are moving still, Though almost sealed in silence chill. And murmuring, as they stand ajar, "Good night, mamma-good night, mamma!"

> From Godey's Lady's Book. Song of the Dying King. BY L. J. W.

It is said of the celebrated Danish king, that, after a life of great military glory, he was at last made prisoner and condemned to die. He drowned the acute feelings of his sufferings by singing a chronicle of his exploits, believing that this would ensure him a happy entrance into the Paradise of Valhalla. Oh! strong was my arm in the battle's strife, And valiant my sword in fight! When the demon of carnage around me was rife, I cowered not in my might! Though the arrows flew thick round my helmeted head, And the javelins fell like rain. Still pressed I on through the battle's din, Still scorned I the victor's chain.

The war-horse bent 'neath my steady aim-The rider reeled at my blow; The foeman came in his martial pride, But my right arm laid him low! I laid him low in his boasted strength, As the wild wind blasts the flower And little dreamed that the conquering king Should slumber in .Ella's power.

But the banquet of Oden is spread for the brave-The hero shall quaff the red wine; The maids of Valhalla shall wreathe my brow-Immortals shall kneel at my shrine; And REGNER, who lived as the brave should live, Shall die as the brave should die; And enter the hall of the god of death With a smile, that his bliss is nigh!
