PLOWING AND MANURING.

Soils are so differently constituted and located, and present so many pecularities of their own, that only a few rules are of general application. That a gradual deepening of the soil is highly beneficial to crops, is a well settled principle. But even this must be varied, according to the manner in which the manure is to be applied; so that it seems necessary that each shall experiment for himself on his own land. Some most exemplary farmers spread green dressing upon the sward and turn it under from six to ten inches, and say they obtain fine crops of corn from the process, while others declared that they have tried it with an utter want of success. Now it would seem that each one might settle this question for himself, by treating the same kind and amount of manure, first by plowing under, and second by first plowing, and then spreading the manure and working it down two or five inches by the plow, cultivator, horse-hoe or harrow. An experiment of this kind, instituted upon each part of the farm where the soils vary, would produce such results as to satisfy most persons what particular process they ought to pursue with regard to the depth to which manure should be placed from the surface.

FIELD BEANS A PROFITABLE CROP.

In our experience we have found no crop more profitable, than the common white bean. It require little more care than corn ; on the right kind of soil it is quite productive; and most always find a ready market at high prices. There is no product of the soil which contains as much nourishment, pound for pound, as this. The straw makes excellent winter feed for sheep. We have found the smaller kinds to be superior to those of a larger size.

Beans require a dry, warm soil. We have raised them where it was so dry and sandy that scarcely anything else would grow Our beast bean crops have been upon a thin, sandy soil, so filled with stones that it was exceedingly difficult to plough it all, and where the earth over the limestone rocks was no where more than four inches. One acre of such ground we planted with common white beans for ten years successively, and never failed of getting a remunerative crop, and often had a very profitable one. This plot was ploughed, planted, and hoed, at odd spells, when it was so wet that no other ground could be worked.
