The enobling sentiment of State pride has done much for us in this contest. Our pearle have responded to their glorious leader, to his history, and to the long list of services which have immortalized his name; and from this day henceforth it will be somelow-citizens. The Platform of the Democratic National Convention, upon which James Buchanan stands, has been vindicated; the great principle of popular sovereignty advocated in every school District and township in the State, during this fearful conflict, has been vindicated, and the aspersions upon his character have been refuted and trampled

And the proud honor of achieving this aplendid result belong, not to the old Demoeratic party alone, which, with reanimated vigor, entered into the contest and persevered to the end, but we are glad to acknowledge that it has been shared by thousands of national Whigs who have assisted us with all their energies, and who are henceforth to be counted as our brothers, and our compatriots.

A NET FOR KNOW NOTHINGS AND SOUTHERN MEN.-In January, 1842, Millard Fillmore voted to receive a petition offered by John Quincy Adams, in favor of an amendment to the naturalization laws so that alien negroes could become citizens.

His defenders pretend that he voted to receive this petition for the reason that he made it a rule not to vote against the reception of any petition but voted to receive all. This explanation would probably answer a good purpose if it was true; but it is not. Those he liked he voted to receive, and those he did not like he voted against receiving.

About the same time we find him voting against the reception of a petition presented by Cave Johnson, praying the repeal of the Bankrupt law. He had voted for the Bankrupt law, and did not wish it repealed; he therefore voted against the reception of the petition praying its repeal.

He voted to receive the petition to naturalze negroes, and we are bound to believe that he was in favor-of the proposition.

The Contrast.

James Buchanan is a statesman. John C. Fromont is a mere adventurer, without the slightest claims to statesmanship.

James Buchanan has served his country in various civil stations, and always to the satisfaction of the people, for a period of more than forty years. John C. Fremont's civil service covers a period of twenty-one, during which
