A PAINFUL SCENE. -BURNING OF A MOTH-ER AND HER CHILD .- A sad affair occurred in the town of Alleppo, near Steubenville, Ohio, not long since. Mr. Peter Lyons, who resided in a somewhat secluded locality, went out on his daily business in the morning, leaving his wife and young child at home. On returning, several hours after, when he came in sight of his place he saw a column of light smoke wreathing up into the sunlight from the grove where his home was situated, and hurrying forward. perceived nothing but a pile of smoking rafters where his house had been In the road. near the ruins, lay his wife, writhing in agony, with her clothes in cinders, ces Her child was not to be seen; but afterwards, in raking over the ashes of the destroyed habitation, a few white bones were discovered-all that was left of the little creastill lingering in great distress, and not ex- Journal. pected to survive. From what could be gathered from the unfortunate woman, it appears that the fire originated in the upper part of the building, and that, on discovering it, she threw her child on a bed and hastily ran out for some water. The progress of the flames was almost unparalleled in rapidity; and on her return, seeing all hope of extinguishing the fire at an end, she also found, to her horror, that she could not reach the room where she had left the child. She made several desperate attempts, but the flames at last caught her dress, and the instinct of self-preservation then caused her to escape from the dwelling, and to rush along the road, calling for help, ill the torture of her blazing garments overfound her. GENTEEL PROFESSIONS .- Now-a-days, pa rents entertain a silly notion that their chil dren must be instructed in a genteel profession; they repudiate the "vulgar" notion of bringing a boy up as a carpenter, cabinet maker, shipwright, or in fact any occupation that involves labor. He must be educated for the church, the bar, the law, or for the post of civil engineer-hence those professions are overrun, and hundreds, nay, thousfamilies, being unable to find anything to do. services ; but as theirs is a mechanical occupation, requiring little exercise of the mind, 'it cannot reasonably be expected that they [ should receive the wages of a carpenter or any other skilful mechanic. Genteel profession, in a few years, will not be sought after by fathers and mothers for their sons, as good investment for the capital expended upon their education.

OBITUARY.

At the residence of his father, in this place. Mr. JOHN COLLINS, aged 20 years. The volume of life has rarely opened with more promise than in the case of him, whose early and sudden death we are called upon to mourn. He had closed his collegiate career with honor, and returned to the parental roof, full of high hopes and manly ambition. Already had he made himself master of the most abstruse volumes of Law, and, tho' he had not yet attained his majority, was fast prepairing to enter the ranks of his profession. His intimate friends,-unobtrusive as he was-could not fail to see in his practical good sense, his sound and logical manner of treating questions, an indication of the completest success in after life.

But genious when mingled with the clods of the valley, however it may fall upon the ear of the world, affords no consolation to mourning friends! Turn we, then, to examine the life and character of our departed friend. He was pious! He had the simplicity and truthfulness of a child; while his ally kept in a country store. frank and manly bearing secured to him all the respect and confidence due to those of riper years. During a short but intimate acquaintance, the writer never heard him utter a word which might not be inscribed on his headstone and do honor to his memory. No profane or obscene word ever polluted his lips, nor ever so much as an unkind expression. He had no enemies-for he deserved none. What wonder then that all who gazed on his remains after " deaths effacing fingers," had swept the lines of his manly features felt a grief that would not be controlled May Heaven impart to his friends resigna-
