MORE'S CELEBRATED LIQUID GLUE.

THE GREAT ADHESIVE
is a useful article ever invented, for house and office, surpassing in utility every other glue, gum, mucilage, paste or cement ever known.

Always Ready for Application.
CONSIDER ON PAPER, CLOTH, LEATHER, FURNITURE, PORCELAIN CHINA, MARBLE, OR GLASS.

Manufacturing Fancy Articles, Toys, etc. It has no superior, not only possessing greater strength than any other known article, but adheres quickly, leaving no stain where the glue is joined. NEVER FAILS.

Within the last three years upwards of 250,000 boxes of this justly celebrated LIQUID GLUE have been sold, and the great convenience which it affords in every case, has deservedly secured for it a wide-spread sale. The manufacturer has found it difficult to meet the demand, and has been obliged to increase the price. He has used it, that its merits are far above any other article or imitation ever offered to the public.

This GLUE is extensively counterfeited by the use of the name "McRea's Celebrated Liquid Glue." Beware of cheap imitations. Take no other.

BEATTY'S ARABIAN HORSE OINTMENT

IS WARRANTED to cure in every instance, if used according to directions, Ringbone, Spavin, Splint, or any other chronic or hard lump. It does not like "veneer oil" of the present day, profess to cure all ill to which man and beast are heir to, but will most assuredly cure the above and remove all blemishes resulting, such as lumps, calluses, &c. It accomplishes its cures by penetrating the pores and converting the humors or calluses into pus, which matter is then discharged through the skin without removing the hair.

Manufactured and sold by James H. Beatty and also at the Drug Store of Dr. Wm. LEMMON and at the store of THOMAS DEVINE Ebensburg, Pa. [Jan. 20.]

A TALE FOR FICKLE LOVERS

"EMILY, Emily, my darling, is it true? Say it again—only once again, Emily!"

Emily lifted up her face, with a soft, tremulous smile, as her hazel eyes answered the ardent question of her lover's glance.

"Yes, yes, Edward," she replied, and the words were sweet to his eager ear.

"And again, Emily! I could hear you say it forever, my love!" said the young man.

He bent his handsome head to kiss the lips that had said, what no other lips had ever said to him, "I love you." But his caress was given back with half-timid, yet earnest tenderness, and his soft blue eye beamed with happy emotion. It was Edward Vane's first wooing, and the pleasure he experienced was as rare and delicious as it was novel; for, to the young lover declaring his earliest attachment, is not the timid "yes," and the kiss of her he loves, the sweetest thing he has ever known?

Under the trees, in the garden of the old parsonage, they walked together in the sunset, after this sweet confession—walking side by side, Edward holding Emily's hand, and talking tenderly to her as they went, with his warm heart beaming in his handsome face, and Emily listening silently, with a happiness whose very silence manifested its depth; and the sun sank lower, and the shadows grew longer, as the pleasant moments slipped away—golden moments to Edward and Emily; and, finally, as the twilight began to gather, they heard the voice of Emily's father, calling her from his study.

"They went back, and now, standing for a single instant longer in the old stone porch, under the curtaining vines, Edward drew Emily to his breast again, and pressed his lips gently to her cheek.

"A few moments, my darling, before you go to him," said Edward. "Let me see him first. I must tell him—"

A happy thrill ran through Emily's heart. She laid her head quietly on her lover's bosom, and kissed softly the beloved hand that held her own in a lingering clasp.

"Yes, tell him," she said, with a blush; and then loosing herself from his embrace, she went away, while Edward Vane sought her father's study.

It was no new thing to the good old pastor that Edward and his daughter loved each other; he had seen it long since—had known it perhaps before they themselves. Edward was not, it may be, the husband her father would have chosen for her; affectionate in disposition, with an ardent temperament, but impulsive—changing—uncertain of purpose—all this the old man had seen him to be; but he himself had not many years to live; they loved each other, and it might be, after all, for the best. At any rate, he could not find it in his heart to cross their love, and so his consent was given, and Emily and her lover received his blessing.

And now the old parsonage seemed another Eden, in whose garden dwelt only happiness. But has not every Eden its serpent? It came in dark, but beautiful and shining guise; it came in the shape of Emily's lovely cousin Helena, who, with her sweet bewitching face, glided in upon the happy lovers and brought fascination with her.

It was not that Helena Wyndham, with her beauty and pride, cared for Emily's lover, that she left for awhile the score of suitors at whose expense she had been amusing herself, coquetting with them all by turns, and giving hope to none; but Edward was handsome, and winning, and elegant; and, above all, he had never knelt at her shrine—the insatiable heart-hunter! And so, for the elate of a new conquest, she came daily over from her father's magnificent estate to Hadley parsonage, to win away, with her bewitching smile, the heart of her cousin's lover.

Emily saw her, riding lightly along on her white steed, with her dark locks braided, and her snowy plume waving to the breeze, her red lips smiling, and her dark eyes beaming with the delight of anticipated triumph. Emily, sitting with her father and her lover in the old parsonage study, saw this brilliant cousin, and thought, "How lovely Helena is!" But the thought was not mingled with envy. She had won a heart without Helena's fascinations; and her soft cheek colored, and her clear hazel eyes beamed with innocent happiness as she looked at her lover.

A moment more, and the quiet of that happy little circle was broken by the appearance of this beautiful enchantress-cousin. Emily and her father both knew Helena's hollow heart, yet they gave her kindly greeting. She was their kin. They never dreamed with what intent she had come. They, in their charity for others, could not conceive that she had an idea of evil regarding them.

But Helena Wyndham laughed at their charity. She did not scruple to abuse it when it served her purpose so to do; and she glided in, in her elegant attire, with her soft, yet brilliant beauty, her captivating manner, her keen, delicate, light-flashing wit, and placed herself in bewildering, dazzling contrast to her fair, simple, unworldly, and yet noble cousin Emily. It was not the first time Edward had seen her; but he had never viewed her so nearly, never spoken to her before this evening. Helena took care that his earliest impression of her should be only an agreeable one.

She was peerless in her loveliness, her grace, her mental gifts; she would have adorned a royal court. Edward was a scholar and a gentleman, cultivated and refined, and a passionate admirer of beauty. It would have been a marvel if one like him had resisted her enchantments, for she was the very spirit of beauty.

"How incomparably lovely!" was his mental exclamation as she sat near him, gayly and carelessly chatting with her uncle and Emily, and now and then turning her bright, yet softened glance upon him, with some smiling word of remark, or observation, that drew him ere long from silent admiration into animated converse with the rest.

He did not mentally compare her with Emily. He was not thinking of Emily when he said to himself that the world could contain no face more enchanting than that of this charming guest; but during the hour that Helena stayed he experienced a pleasure, the nature of which he could hardly have defined, had he tried, and the depth of which he never sought to fathom. He only knew that he admired Miss Wyndham very much.

And so the heartless beauty lingered as long as it suited her, seeing plainly, and with secret delight, how Edward Vane was attracted, until she was fully satisfied with her first attempt, and bidding the party a graceful adieu, vanished like some brilliant star, that, while we are eagerly, delightedly watching it, hides itself behind the clouds. And Emily never dreamed whose eyes that star had dazzled.

When next she met her beautiful cousin, it was after some time at the little village church; and as Emily lingered near the door, awaiting her father, Helena, in passing, slightly tapped the young girl's cheek with her gloved hand.

"How came you ever to attract so elegant, so distinguished a lover as Edward Vane?" she asked. "Do you know that I am quite pleased with him? and that is dangerous for you, you know! Take care, my pretty cousin, that I do not win him away from you. By the way, dear, my brother Frederick has also become acquainted with him, and, I believe cultivates his acquaintance most sedulously. At any rate, he has invited him to spend a day or two with us this week. You can afford to lose him for that time—can't you, Emily dear?"

Finishing her heartless speech with a soft laugh and a kiss on her cousin's lips, she passed on to her carriage; and Emily looked after her an instant, with a sudden tremor at her heart, a startled pallor overspreading her cheeks, saying, in a low, half-bitter reproach, "Helena, Helena, was that what you came for?"

Emily only said to Edward when he came again, "Do you know Frederick Wyndham, Edward?"

"Yes, Emily—I was introduced to him not long ago—did I not mention it? I am forgetful of everything but you, my darling?" he added, with a beaming smile. Then he continued, "Yes, and only yesterday, he made me half promise to come and pass a day or two with him at his father's. I do not know whether I shall go, though he is very urgent. He seems to like me."

A dull pain went through Emily's heart; but she would say nothing, nor let him suspect what she felt.

"Will he go?" she asked, mentally; and with slow and unhappy suspense she waited to see.

Edward did go. If he had foreseen the result he might have been wiser; but with him, as is the case with many others, wisdom was purchased with experience.

During the days that he spent with Frederick Wyndham he was thrown frequently into the society of the beautiful Helena; their acquaintance matured, and his admiration grew deeper with every hour that passed, revealing some new beauty, some new grace in the variable, wayward, yet ever-enchanting Helena.

When Emily met him again she longed to ask him, "Do you not like my beautiful cousin?" But she refrained. "I will not mock myself," she thought; "how can he help liking—nay, even loving her?"

It was not Edward's last visit at his friend's. Helena chose to win him, and there was little resistance made. Frederick was a pleasant friend, and Edward Vane, neglecting to question his own heart too closely, said that it was because of this that he liked so well to go there.

But he always saw Helena. They played and sang together—together rambled over the fine grounds around the mansion, and read from the same book. And Helena's voice had wondrous sweetness in its tones, and the gentle glance of her dark eyes, in her subdued moments, was one of most enchanting softness. And Edward listened to the sweet voice, and met the soft glance of the lovely dark eyes, yielding each day more completely to their delicious fascination, until his heart was won quite away from Emily.

Yes—he loved Helena; he acknowledged it at last to himself; and now, unable to resist her influence, and dreading to meet Emily's sight, he went no more to Hadley parsonage.

He gave
