"Beau" Caldwell was a sporting genius, of an extremely versatile character. Like all his fraternity, he was possessed of a pliancy of adaptation to circumstances that enabled him to succumb with true philosophy to misfortune, and also to grace the more exalted sphere of prosperity with that natural ease attributed to gentlemen with bleated

Fertile in ingenuity and resource, "Beau" was rarely at his "wit's end" for that "nest egg" of the gambler, a "stake." His providence, when in luck, was such as to keep him continually on the qui vive for a nucleus to build upon. Beau, having exhausted the pockets and 2 squares, [24 lines liberality of his contemporaries in Charles- 3 squares, [36 lines] ton, S. U, was constrained to "pitch his tent" in fresh pastures. He, therefore, selected Abbeville, whither he was immediately expediated by the agency of a "free pass."

Saugly esconded in his hotel, "Beau" ruminated over the means to raise the "plate." The barkeeper was assailed, but he was discovered to have scruples, (anomalous barkeeper!) The landlord was a "glum wretch," with no soul for speculation. The cornered "sport" was finally reduced to the alternative of a "confidence operation." Having arranged his scheme, he rented his a prececious negro boy, and borrowed an old theodolite. - Thus equiped, "Beau" betook himself to the abode of a neighboring planter, notorious for his wealth, obstinacy and ignorance Operations were commenced by sending the "nigger" into the planter's barn-yard with a flag-pole. "Beau" get himself up into a charming tableau, directly in front of the house. He now roared at the top of his voice, "72,000,000-45-8-11." After which he went to driving small stakes, in a very promiseuous manner about the preme-

The planter hearing the shouting, and curious to ascertain the cause, put his head out

"Now," said "Beau," again assuming his little further-there, that'll do. 47,000-62

"What the d-l are you doing in my barn yard?" roared the planter.

"Beau" would not consent to answer this interrogation, but pursuing his business halloed out to his "niggar:"

"Now, go to the house, place your pole sgainst the kitchen door, higher-stop at test, 87,45,6."

"I say there," again vociferated the plantor, "get out of my yard." "I am afraid we will have to go right through the house;" soliloquised "Beau." "Bean" now looking up for the first time,

"Now," said the planter, while "Beau" was paying marked attention to a hen turkey, "it's mighty inconvenient to have one's homestead smashed up, without so much as seking the liberty. And more than that, if there's law to be had, it shant be did ei-

"Pooh! nonsense, my dear friend," replied "Beau," "its the law that says the railroad must be laid right through kitchens. Why we have gone through seventeen kitchens and eight parlours in the last eight milespeople don't like it, but then it's law and there's no alternative, except the party persuades the surveyor to move a little to the left, and as curves cost money, most folks let it go through the kitchen.'

"Cost something, eh?" said the planter, eagerly catching at the bait thrown out for

"Let me see, said "Beau," counting his fingers, forty and forty, and one hundred and dred dollars will do it. Unrolling a large map, intersected with lines running in every direction, he continued. "There is your house and here's the road. Air line You sue, to move to the left we must excavaie this hill. As we are desirous of retaining the good will of parties residing on the route. I'll agree on the part of the company to secure the alteration, and prevent your house from being molested."

The clanter revolved the matter in his mind for a moment, and then exclaimed. "You'll guarantee the alteration?"

"Give a written document." "Then, it's a bargain."

The planter without more delay, gave "Beau" an order on his city factor for the also act as Auctioneer at Public Sales whenever oon. stipulated sum, and received in exchange a his services in that capacity are required. written document, guaranteeing the freedom of the kitchen from any encreachments by
