Gazing on life's wave's retreating. Gath'ring mists bedew mine eye; And I seem to hear the beating, Loving hearts of lost ones nigh. Faces bent in fondness o'er me, Voices sing my childhood's song; Passes on the train before me, None yet missing from the throng.

Come again, in accents broken, Tones that breathed a last adieu, When fend eyes looked love unspoken, As they faded from my view. Can my heart then else than languish O'er the dream of other years? Chide not then its song of anguish, Grief dissolves in dewy tears.

THE LAND OF DREAMS.

BY FRED. ENOCH. There's a land, a radiant land, That the spirit often seeks, Upon whose golden strand The waves of fancy breaks; There the skies are ever fair, And the sunlight ever beams, And the flowers are bright and rare, In that land-the land of dreams.

In that land, that radient land, Is many a dwelling place. Whose beauty buman hand Could never, never trace; There joyous songs are heard, In the vales of crystal streams, From breeze, and voice, and bird. In that land-the land of dreams

To that land, that radiant land, Whose spirit has not sailed, To seek the golden strand, When the joy of earth-life fatied; In thought's brave barque alone, To the realm of changeless beams, For the radiance only known In that land-the land of dreams;

The spirit land of dreams.
