CONSTANT LOVE.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

That time has dimn'd thine eyes;

Still still my path thou cheerest,

As in days that are gone by.

By sorrows, cares and fears ;

By the clouds of other years.

If time nuch mere had taken,

And its love for me was left.

Than when I met with thee;

As years have o'er me past:

If they are what hearts should be.

When my brow has been o'creast.

I could forgive each theft ;

I, too, an something older

But hearts become no older,

Thy own has never altered,

Thy love has never faltered,

Then tell me not of changes,

In check, or brow or hair;

Must be lighter far than air.

Though morning's early splendor

May raptures thrill impart,

The vesper hour, more tender,

Sinks deeper in the heart.

Yet autum's hand encloses

Though spring be gay with roses,

And summer skies are clear;

The richest harvest of the year.

The love such loss estranges

That thy brow is somewhat shaded

Whilst our hearts remained unshaken,

Say not thy cheek is faded,

Nay, tell me not, my dearest,

"Why. Eliza! what a strange choice for a wedding dress! your other dresses are in very good style, and you have plenty of them; for a girl of eighteen?
