I went into the ki chen to light the fire in the stove, and having got dinner on the way. went into the room for something, and there the children were, building a house of stove wood which they had carried in from the shed; but it was rather more than I could bear when I saw that Charley had my cloak wrapped around him and ever his head, as he sat on the floor playing "peep" with the baby -it pulling for life at the tassel. I forgot everything there, and took it from him much quicker than he put it on. I was not aware that at the time that I gripped his arm so tight as to warrant a yell, but he indulged in one at any rate. I put the cloak away and retreated to the kitchen, leaving my mother to entertain them as best she could.

As soon as Mrs. Wood heard the rattle of dishes she brought her work out into the kitchen to watch us. I did not do a thing but she saw it, and I only hope she will know all about the way I work tho next time she comes. When I again joined our company Mts. Wood had her cloak basted together, and requested me to act as a "form" while she fitted it. I was all obedience, but could scarcely suppress a suite, for it had no more fit to it than if it had been made without a single seam. She insinuated that she wished I would take the seissors and sit down and alter it for when one overpowering sentiment subjects hi own work. Just then one of the children came in with some blocks, with which the baby commenced pounding a chair, leaving a scar at every blow. Another one imitated : drummer boy by beating a new tin pan which he had taken down in the kitchen, and Charley amused himself by scattering pins over the floor, out of the cushion. Mrs. Wood looked themselves so much.

and scream from the children went through and through it. I gathered up my work and went up stairs, thinking I'd have a quiet time, for a little while, at least.
