

every party, by whom he was elected, ought to be consulted by him.

First, that he might remain perfectly idle and passive, and let the disintegration of the States go on as it had gone on.

Second, give guarantees such as were asked, and bring the whole power of his Administration to bear in obtaining those guarantees; or, third, resort to coercion and attempt to force the seceding States into obedience.

cause of humanity itself, and I appeal to you, apart from these jests, to lend us your aid and countenance in averting a calamity like that."

"Well, gentlemen, I have been wondering very much whether, if Mr. Douglas or Mr. Bell had been elected President, you could have dared to talk with him as freely as you have done to me."

"I am, and always have been, an unwavering enemy of this rebellion—(ceased in its origin, most accused in its progress)—and a supporter of the Administration."
