

too, for the representation of that useful animal was carried upon a piece of pottery.

Lieut. Beale states that, on his first trip across the Continent, he discovered in the midst of the wilderness north of the Gila, what appeared to be a strong fort, the walls of great thickness, built of stone. He traversed it, and found it contained fifty-two rooms. In the vicinity were many more numerous built of hard clay, from the size of a bullet to that of a grape shot. What was singular about them was the fact, that frequently ten or twenty were stuck together, like a number of bullets run out of half a dozen connecting nails, or like a whole building of rolls. It is difficult to say what they were intended for. They were hard, however, that the smaller ones could be discharged from a gun. And now, it remains for the antiquarian to explore this most interesting region in the very heart of our country, and to say who were the people that inhabited it. They may have been the ancestors of the Aztecs, whom Cortez found in Mexico, for they were known to have come from the north. Tradition relates that they sallied out from their northern homes, directed by their prophets into their march till they came across an eagle sitting upon a perch, with a serpent in its claws. This they found where the City of Mexico now stands, and here they established their dominion. This legend is still preserved in the design upon the Mexican dollar. Some remnants of the Aztecs still remained within a few years past at the ruined city of Tula (Tehuacan) or Teotihuacan, in the wilderness of New Mexico. Here, in deep ravines, they kept alive with ceremonial cast, the Sacred Fire, which was always to burn until the return of Montezuma. It only went out about ten years ago, when the last Indian of the tribe expired. It may be that the Pilgrims with the Gila Indians, and the great Aztec nation, led behind in their march to the South. The Pilgrims it is known are far superior to the Indians of Mexico. They raise fine cotton, and from it manufacture all their clothing.

Would that some Stephens or Jayrol would arise to explore the wonders that are concealed within this Great Basin, and to bring to light the history of the strange people that once inhabited it.
