THE OLD CHURCH BELL.

BY NEREUS.

I hear once more those mournful bells
Break on the Sabbath air;
And to my lips comes back again
The long unuttered prayer;
My heart reverberates with them
To old, forgotten chimes,
For with those mournful bells are linked
The thoughts of other times.

The steeple where, a boy, I climbed,
The tombs, the bending yew,
The pulpit, and the solemn aisle,
The unforgotten pew:
The moss upon the sloping roof,
The porch, the lowly door,
Are link'd with forms; whose memory
They only can restore.

Like voices of the past they speak
To unaccustomed ears,
And better thoughts come welling up
With heart-subduing tears;
And though their tones seem sad to me,
My bosom watcher tells
How full of hope have been the chimes
Of those old mournful bells.

Characteristic Traits of the Jews.

In looking over the statistics of New York for the past year, we find that, among the numerous applicants for city aid, there was not one application from that large class in our midst of the tribe of Levi.

No race of people that exist are marked by a more distinctive individuality than the Jews. Mingling for centuries in close relations, commercially and politically—and speaking also the same language—with the Christians and other races of America, Europe and Asia, still, with that deathless tenacity of purpose which marks their whole character, they have preserved their own peculiar distinctiveness of character and organization unvarnished by the tenets of any other faith, or by the crossing, physiologically, with any other nation.

A little anecdote, culled from an article entitled "Wanderings in Servia," in the Dublin University Magazine, for May, will illustrate that trait of the character of the sons of Levi which keeps them always above the want that stoops to the asking for charity from others. It also alludes to the unjust oppression which the race has always received, east or west, the world over. The author, from whom we extract, is reviewing a book entitled "Skizzen aus Slavonien Wanderungen in Sommer 1850" ("Wanderings in Southern Sclavonia in the Summer of 1850"), the year immediately succeeding the unhappy war in Hungary, in which the Sclavonians had taken a part. The following scene will give also some idea of the miseries which war inflicts:—

"The steamer lay to at a somewhat desolate spot, near Neusatz, opposite to Peterwarden. I had been advised to take up my abode at the "White Boat" inn, and a little Jewish boy, who seized upon my carpet-bag as I stepped out of the vessel, offered to be my guide.

"Are you strong enough to carry it?" I said to the lad, whose dress consisted of an old military cap, a worn out Hungarian jacket patched in all directions, and trowsers picked up from the rejected wardrobe of a hussar, as its tatters clearly indicated.

"Why not?" asked the boy, in accent which left no doubt of his Jewish extraction. "And even if I were not strong enough I must still do it, or starve."

"Have you no parents to take care of you?"

"Parents?" replied the lad, shouldering the carpet-bag, and leading the way, "my mother is alive, but they killed my father about a year ago."

"Who killed him?"

"God only knows! he went out early one day, and was found dead in the evening, just outside of the town, and I was in no one's business then to look after the murderer. When a Hungarian met a Jew, he swore for being a Servian, and when a Servian met a Jew, he slew him for being a Magyar. My mother was at her wit's end to support me and my brothers and sisters, and I was the eldest of her w. Then came the d. . . . which was burnt to the ground, and we possessed; what was saved the soldiers took. I do not know if they were Servians or Magyars, and when we upon one day in the morning, we had nothing left. Since then my mother has been a widow; she lives with the sisters from a little village hard by. I go every day to the steamer, and give her what I earn."

"And do you earn something every day?" said I, admiring the supporter of a household.

"I must, sir," was the answer, "otherwise we should all starve; when I get no job at the steamer, I manage to earn something by selling cigars up at the castle; I make four kreutzers by every packet, and I generally sell at least four packets every day."

"And is that enough for you to live upon?"

"We must manage it that way; we have lived upon it and moreover, since New Years' day, I have laid by three florins; with these I shall buy pipe sticks and fix for matches; and if I have any money left over and above, I shall buy laces, thread and bulk reels, and things will be better with us then."

The hard-fated Jew boy was a true type of his whole race—so often beat but never broken. Crushed by misfortune, the Jew loses all but his untiring energy, is ever ready to begin life again; he never loses patience, but turns a stone into a farthing and a farthing into a florin."

The Jews have been stigmatized the world over as usurers, as a nation treacherous, as a nation so fond of money that it would sell its own soul for a dime.

But look into the aggregate character, and we find a race devoted in kindness to the members of its own individual family, and one, if it attempts to overreach in trade outside nations, it acts but in accordance with the letter of its own code of laws—"an eye for an eye," &c., repaying some part only of the interest it owes for long back persecutions, and revilings, and despiteful usings.

Surely the spirit of pride that keeps all the members of so large and so diffused a family above want and charity is worthy of all praise.

Kindness the Best Punishment.

A Quaker of most exemplary character, having been disturbed one night by footsteps around his dwelling, rose from his bed and cautiously opened a back door to reconnoitre. Close by was an out-house, and under it a cellar, near a window of which was a man busily engaged in receiving the contents of his pork barrel from another within the cellar. The old man approached, and the man outside fled. He stepped up to the cellar window and received the pieces of pork from the thief within, who, after a little while, asked his supposed accomplice, in a whisper, "Shall we take it all?"

The owner of the pork said softly, "Yes, take it all," and the thief industriously handed up the balance through the window, and then came up himself. Imagine his consternation when, instead of greeting his companion in crime, he was confronted by the Quaker. Both were astonished; for the thief proved to be a near neighbor, of whom none would have suspected such conduct. He pleaded for mercy, begged him not to expose him, spoke of the necessities of poverty, and promised faithfully never to steal again.

"If thou hadst asked me for meat," said the old man, "I would have given thee. I pity thy poverty and thy weakness, and esteem thy family. Thou art forgiven."

The thief was greatly rejoiced, and was about to depart when the old man said, "Take the pork neighbor."

"No, no," said the thief, "I don't want the pork."

"Thy necessity was so great that it led thee to steal. One half of the pork thou must take with thee."

The thief insisted that he could never eat a morsel of it. The thought of the crime would make it choke him. He begged the privilege of letting it alone. But the old man was incorrigible, and furnishing the man with a bag, had half the pork put therein, and laying it upon his back, sent him home with it. He met his neighbor daily for many years afterwards, and their families visited together, but the matter was kept secret; and though in after years the circumstance was mentioned, the name of the delinquent was never made known.

The punishment was severe and effectual. It was probably his first—it was certainly his last attempt to steal. Had the man been arraigned before a court of justice and imprisoned for the petty theft, how different might have been the result! His family disgraced, their peace destroyed, the man's character ruined, and his spirit broken. Revenge, not penitence, would have swayed his heart; the scorn of the world would have blackened his future, and in all probability, he would have commenced a course of crime at which, when the first was committed, his soul would have shuddered.

And what would the owner of the pork have gained? Absolutely nothing. Kindness was the best punishment, for it saved while it punished.

ANOTHER OF THE SIGNERS.—Another of the famous New England Anti-Nebraska clerical memorialists has turned up under rather disreputable circumstances—the Rev. John C. Webber. He induced a Miss Nancy Mead, of Hillsborough, N. H., a member of the Methodist church of that place, to take a ride with him. After they had got on the way, he told her he had separated from his former wife, and wanted to marry her. Nancy, after a little shying, consented, so they stopped at a tavern at West Deering, where he introduced her as his wife. She did not know what to say to it at first, but thinking that he would marry her, as she says, she made no opposition to carrying out the character of the Reverend Mrs. Webber. The sequel was that she was grossly taken in and done for. The rascal didn't marry her, and had no intention of doing so. He couldn't; he had a wife already.—He was arrested and held for trial.

This is another of the "signers"—another of the one thousand and fifty New England clergymen who protested against the Nebraska bill "in the name of Almighty God."

Boots and Shoes.

Again we come in sorrow to the mart,
But change in time and fashion comes,
The cut of a boot and shoe has varied
And peace has to her throne ascended,
And quickly with returning peace
Let every heart in unison rejoice,
And cultivate a spirit kind
No mischief moves a subtle mind
Throw by the boots by years collected
A little old and somewhat antiquated
And call again at number five,
Your shoe the place you'll find to suit,
Whose will want to wear with pleasure,
And Cutler's there to take your measure
He left cheap ride, with a shilling,
And stops at Brown's Block, number five,
And when he's fairly started in trade
He'll make a boot that can't be beat
He needs to serve a master of his craft,
To call him Cutler tells the story
Young men with interests may put it by,
Protect with boots your ankle bone,
Or in the Gaiters better please
Consult your tastes, comfort, ease
The Congress forms with Cossacks
Diversified in their relations
May better meet your expectations,
And satisfy your inclinations,
Come Ladies come, or send your waiters,
And find as neat a pair of Gaiters
As ever graced a Lady's feet.
Of nature fine of fashion neat,
Morocco, Bootees, Russian Slips,
Some plain, some satin, leather tips,
Enameled work with stitches laid
And some of the finest of French Kid
The Misses too with modest poise,
Will find the means their feet to hide,
In fancy colors, tree from stain,
Without suppressing given a charm,
We've Shoes which Boys and Girls suffice
And Ballets of the smallest size,
The goods we've had to order made,
Designed for our specific trade,
In ponderous piles approach our doors,
In heaps on beams and scores on scores,
Doubt not the choicest goods are there,
They open rich and even fine,
And though their speech may seem quite bold,
You'll find the half has not been told

BOOTS & SHOES.

Although the "Erie war has ended,
And peace has to her throne ascended,"
You'll find that rhyming without reason,
Is not befitting thy season;
To boast and vaunt is not our part,
And thus degrade the rhyming art.
We only tell you what is true
About the firm of S. Deveau.
We lead the fashions all must know,
While others follow, sure but slow
"Coltzer" tis true, has left "cheapside,"
But still his place is well supplied
By one more tasty and more neat,
Who's always ready at his seat,
And when your feet to measure call,
You may be sure he'll "give them fits"
While mingling elegance with ease,
We know he cannot fail to please
He move to Philadelphia go,
To Lyran, New York, or Buffalo,
Nor yet to "Brown's Block number ten,
To find why Cotter left, or when,"
For here at Cheapside, number five,
You'll find an active busy hive
Of workmen skilled, of workmen neat,
Who never fail to fit the feet.
At leisure you our stock can view
Of every quality and hue,
And gratify the ruling passion,
Of always being in the fashion:
For when a pretty foot you view,
The reason is ('twixt me and you,)
Not "in your eye" but in the shoe,
So neatly made by S. Deveau.
Hoping kind friends that we may meet,
In boots and shoes we'll act your pleasure,
And though our measures fail in feet,
Your feet shall never fail in measure:
Come on, we say, come one and all,
And give your friend Deveau a call.
