house. "Indeed, love, I cannot conjecture," was his affectionate reply, assisting her up the steps as he spoke, for they were now at the door. They entered the house, and shortly afterwards retired for the night. Before asleep, they heard the strings of a guitar touched, and immediately beneath their window, a manly voice deep-toned, and apparently sorrowful, sung the words of a popular sentimental song. This of course served to increase the wonder of Julia and her husband. It was strange—it was mysterious. On the following morning, Mr West inquired of the domestics if any of them knew the person.

the domestics if any of them knew the person. Each answered in the negative; none knew him; they had heard the music, and been his person, but nothing more.

Theodore was of necessity absent during the day—in the city attending to his business. On his return home the next evening, his wife informed him that "gentleman of handsome exterior had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had been noticed on the premises by the service had cash it? Something he had just heard—was announced, and they sat down to the evening meal; afterwards to the piano—and in the mutual endearments of domestic happiness, they mutual endearments of domestic happiness, they entirely forgot the incident. To be sure, there was nothing alarming-nothing to be apprehended; but it was singular that a man should be loitering about. Rising from the piano, the happy couple left the parlor and retired to the privacy of their own chamber; where, walking out upon the balcony in front, they scated themselves to pass the social hour of love and contemplation. The moon, the stars, the shining river, and the distant view, were mingled on the sight, whilst cumstance were affluent, his profits in commerce had resolved to leave her husband.
