As the tremulous tones of the aged clergyman pronounced them husband and wife, the smile faded from her lip and brow, and the fringed lids of her dark eyes droopped low upon her pale cheek; but it was a transient emotion, for when she bent her head for the bridal blessing, that glad smile glanced like sunshine over her bright face, and slept in the clear depths of her dark

It was all over—the sunlight had trembled and faded in the azure clouds while we lingered in the dim, old church; and when the young bride went forth, the sobbing wind was sweeping through the lofty pines and waving the hemlook branches to and fro with sudden fury, while here and there, a rain drop slept like a tear upon the dark green turf.

Hastily we separated to avoid the gathering storm, and the church was left alone once more in its gloomy beauty; while the newly wedded pair swept off to the adjacent city.

Three years had passed since the bridal at the village church. The old and faithful clergyman had gone to meet the loved and lost; and one bright summer's day, when all that nature had I of leveliness seemed mingled in its bird-songs and its sun-hine.
