It was a wearisome, fatiguing day to Mrs. Snelling, who did the whole work of her house-hold. Her oldest son was learning his father's trade, and the dinner for the two had to be on the table precisly at twelve, for they had but an hour's nooning. So searealy where the breakfast things cleared away, when there was the meat and vegetables to prepare for a "boiled dinner;" and twice she was obliged to stand and be pinned up in the thick jean lining Miss Prime was fitting with unexampled tightness. The afternoon was no better; She had Tuesday's ironing to finish, years old, and very heavy, he required to be nur-sed and tended as if he had been a baby. She wanted to sew with Miss Prime; but no somer would she gether weedle threated, and her thimble, on, than some new demand would be made upon her time, and so the short afternoon passed before she could stitch up a seam, and ten must face, and the current report of young Robert Hubbe ready by dark. Besides all this, Miss Prime bard's dissipation came into her mind. "All perwas disposed to centinue her conversation with sons have their own troubles; some don't sta very fittle pause or stint, discussing the affairs of the neighborhood and the church with a train of moral, religious and personal reflections. Every one knows how fatiguing it is to be expected to to live in peace and charity to all. I've got so listen to such a discourse, and respond in the now I only ask for patience to bear the trial of right place, even when the mind is unoccupied; the time, instead of praying to have it changed and then the dress did not look near so well as and thinking that I could bear any other better.
