The Judge's Mustard Bath.

Two or three days ago, a young friend who has recently been spending some time in Georgia, re-lated to us an anecdote which shows how theroughly sacred the people of Georgia were dur-ing the prevalence of the yellow fever in Sava-nah

It seems that Judge B-g of the Bearense Court of the State, was in the upper country at the time, but within twenty hour's ran, by mail, of the terrible disease. Quite suddenly, late one afternoon, he was seized with a headache, pain in his back, limbs, &c. Having heard that these were salutations Yellow Jack extended to his victims on approaching them, the Judge, in great consternation, applied to a friend who was "pes-

a liar, to commence with. It was shown that ted," for advice. A hot mustard bath was urshe was in Easton's company at nine o'clock on gently advised, and being prepared the Judge was soon laving himself in the irritating fuid. Presently he felt better, and finding s cake of scap in the vessel of water he began to apply it quite freely upon the person.

After quite pleasant exercise in this way, he looked down for the first time on his body and limbs, and discovered that he was turning black! have had with him at the time of the murder- Oh, herror! His friend was harriedly sent for. came and declared that the symptoms were in-

THE MILLER'S BOARDER. BY GEORGE P. SURNHAM.

In the villege of Clatville, in one of the northera counties of England, there lived, some years since, a man named Rushton, a miller by occu pation, a quist, good natured man, and thrifty in his business. Rob was very intimately known by the whole neighborhood, for his mill was the only good one about, in the region of Clat-after his marriage the miller and his wife got along nicely, without any domestic, living frugally and happily. At last, there came along an old bachelor by the name of Henry Blessner, who desired to take lodgings with them. He house safely. and he had had enough of the confusion of town life. The terms were agreed upon, and Bless-ner took up his abode at the "Pond House," as Rushton called his residence.

Soon after, the miller's wife found the care of her family two great for her, and a servant was tain all the money Blesancr was supposed to taken into the house to assist her, to whom but for She would lie, when she committed faults, and she was not over-industrious in her inclina-

A week afterwards the miller and his wife went over to the shire town, on a temporary vislost the way, mistaking the road After riding some miles after dark, the miller discovered his mistake, and turned homeward once more, where he did not arrive until near midnight.

He found his douse locked fast, and supposing from the lateness of the hour that the occupants were asleep, he knpcked hastily, and caled for Betsey :

ed that Rushton had started from to wn at a certain hour, and that he ought to wave been at home quite as soon as the period of his arrival there, thus sworn by the servant girl. The watch and papers found in the prisoner's pocket, were identified as Blessner's property; and his bloody bands was the final turning point against him. To certain questions put to Betaey by the defendant's counsel, she stated that she was but little acquainted with a young man named Easton. She had seen him-knew who was meant
