The German Journal of San Francisco has latey given a number of interesting articles Contain. ing reminiscences of travels in Chihushus and Sonors, by Julius Proebel, Esq. We translate the following: The Apaches make frequent inroads into the outhern portions of Sonors and Chihuahua, although they reside farther north. In the latter State they frequently meet their bereditary fore, the Communes; and the Mexicans have managed to profit from this hostility, by aiding one tribe against the other. The history of these Indian wars is full of romantic episodes, which would furnish the richest material for the pen of a Cooper. Some years ago the Government of Chihandua formed an offensive and defensive alliance with the Comanches of the Bolson de Mapimi, for the purpose of carrying on war against the Apaches. These Comanches had at that time an old aquaw as their chief, and she was named by the Muxicana, General of all the Comanches. Her eldest son, Bajo el Sel, (Under the Sun,) was an intelligent man, far beyond his tribe. He held his promise, given to the Mexicans to fight the Apaches, as sacred. With a few companions, he once happened to come, about daylight, upon a camp of Apaches, and refusing to beat a retreat, he rushed in and committed dreadful havoe among the merprised warriors; but at last he and his comrades were overpowered and slain. There are so many Mexican captives among both tribes, that every thing of this kind is soon known among the population of Chihushus, who: on the other hand, have so much Indian blood in their veins that they take pride in the bold deeds

Though the Apaches forbid their square to have any connection with white men, they place a high value on white women, whom they consider as the most prectous booty to be obtained ferent in different cases. Some of the chiefs treat their wifes comparatively well. The Apaches are much kinder to their captive women than the Comanches; and exemples are not wanting where lived with a priest in Senora, made himself famous as a chief. He had stolen a Mexican girl from the house where he formerly lived, and she
