The Case Stated.

The Washington Star, in noticing the promptness of the press and the public to censure the Post Office Department for, every fanoied grievance, indulges in the following sensible remarks. Folks, says that paper, have a foolish habit of economics the apparent working of the English postal sytem and ours; taking the former-operating over a small territory, thickly populated, where labor is cheap, with the latter operating over an immense surface of space, covered with a very scarce population, where labor is much dearer. Now, if they would but, like sensible souls, form their comparison of the services rendered for the money paid for those services, upon the number of miles actually traveled, the weight of mail matter carried, and the difference in the means of mail transportation incident to the real condition of the traveling facilities in all parts of the two countries, they would have sound and reliable data on which to arrive at sensible business-like conclusions with reference to the meaning in which the Post Office Department's affire are conducted in this country.
