The public have intierly had presented to them rathe novel farmer in the journalism of the day, in the shape of elaborate deientific treations on modical subjects appearing in consecutive chapters in the advertising and news columns of the daily and weekly newspapers of the city.

These articles are from the pest of Dr. Hunter, No. 825 Brundway, the well knows printitioner in palmonary and branchial diseases, and are distinguished from the empyrical programmes assaily put forth through the same mediam, by their thorough acquaintance with the subjects treated of the simplicity and clearness of their language and the demonstrative force of the arguments employed. With these qualities to recommend them to our attentie we cannot but welcome the appearance of these articles as heralding an important and beneficial revolution in the traditions and practice of the modical profession. There is no purarit in which the spirit of old fogyism has, in spit of the onlightenment of the age, managed more completely to trammel and subdue the human intellect.
