It is true, we learn, that they did not vote all the stock they held proxies for. They voted all their own stock, but refused to vote their proxies, because, said one of them, the question of routes was so evenly balanced in his mind, that he did not feel authorized to decide the question by voting for other stockholders. And hence, instead of keeping those proxies in reserve, as the Gueette charges, all the Buffalo stockholders left the meeting before the polls were closed, and long before the result was known, thus leaving the responsibility upon the shoulders of these who refused to vote. We believe that they should not have so loft it-the bill under which they voted was passed against the wishes of the people of Erre-they should, fo the sake of peace, have located the route of the road as it was the manifest wish of the people to have it located. We believe that such course was due to the Directors here; but because Richmond, and the other Buffalo stockholders did not view it in this light, that fact is no excuse for those of our own citizens who had the power to compel them.
